January Features That You must Not miss!

IN all this list of features for January THERE IS NOT ONE FOOT OF PADDING! The Universal has gained a reputation for producing features that are boiled down to the very essence and we intend to maintain that enviable reputation. With the Universal scoring triumph after triumph, leaving all competition far behind in the matter of quality and with THE GREATEST LIST OF GENUINE MOVING PICTURE STARS EVER GATHERED BY ONE COMPANY, is it any wonder that exhibitors everywhere are using the brains God gave them and DEMANDING THAT UNIVERSAL PROGRAM?

Every One of These Features Is Really GREAT!

Two solid reels of hysterics! Two reels of the screamingest fun ever snapped by a moving picture camera. Two reels that caused the dignified Board of Censors to double up with laughter. The kind of comedy you have prayed for. The kind we have been working our heads off to give you. You haven't a minute to lose before ordering your one and three and six sheet posters and all your other advance advertising. Not only the timeliest but the best burlesque we have ever seen. Take our word for it and arrange immediately for "WHEN URSUS THREW THE BULL."

King Baggot's Greatest Work—"ABSINTHE"

Four reels. Released Jan. 22nd. Made in Paris with King Baggot and Miss Leah Baird in the leading roles, directed by Herbert Brenon and supported by a superb French company. Your exchange will have to charge you extra rental for this. Don't quibble. No matter what you have to pay it will be a terrific money maker for you! Get all your advertising ready!

"THE MERCHANT OF VENICE" Coming Soon

Another four reel feature in which we use our entire enormous equipment and outfit on our great big ranch. This is the most beautiful Shakespearean picture ever made by any company in the world at any time. The cost of production was so terrific that we will have to charge the exchanges more than the usual price. This means that you, too, will have to pay more. We could make five times the profit by selling it on the state rights plan, but we're going to sell it to the regular Universal exchanges, nevertheless! If you're a Universal exhibitor you're lucky!

"AN AMERICAN CITIZEN"

By Madeleine Lucette Ryley

IN MOTION PICTURES

John Barrymore as Beresford Cruger

"Good-bye, old man!"

"You ought to see the other fellow!"

"An American Citizen," the world-famous comedy, presents an exciting trans-continental romance, in which numerous comic complications center about a young American, who, in the midst of all his defeats and victories, never forgets his patriotism, though for a time, due to a chivalrous impulse, he is forced to forego his American citizenship, which he eventually regains, together with love and fortune.

John Barrymore, in the role of Beresford Cruger, who chivalrously sacrifices nationality and fortune and faces all his reverses with a never-say-die fortitude typically American, adds another artistic achievement to his list of stellar triumphs.

1914's TRIUMPHS!

Standing at the threshold of a new year, we can only attempt to guess the mighty secrets concealed in the vaults of time. Yet it requires no prophetical vision to realize that we face in the coming months the dawn of a new era, the most glorious zenith of the motion picture.

During the year that is now dedicated to the past, vast revolutions revealed and developed the greater power of the motion picture. The industry made giant strides and obtained a secure place among the organized activities of mankind. Never in the previous history of the film, phenomenally progressive as it was, were such towering heights attained.

During the year just ushered in, numerous triumphs await us. We will be awarded the delayed victories of many years of battle. We will receive recognition for long and earnest endeavor. But let us face our triumphs, as we have our struggles, with loyalty and sincerity to the trade at large.

JOHN BARRYMORE, IN "AN AMERICAN CITIZEN"

The conjunction of the famous favorite of the American stage, John Barrymore, with a play that is recognized as one of the greatest comedy successes of modern dramatic history, in motion pictures, marks another decisive step in the forward march of the photoplay. "An American Citizen," by Madeleine Lucette Ryley, a trans-continental comedy-romance with a million laughs and a few sighs, presents the noted star in a role almost personally suited to himself.

So real is his performance, so unaffectedly faithful his impersonation, that unconsciously we find ourselves sorrowing in his manly griefs and delighting in his exuberant joys. We follow him through all the rapid complications of the play with a sympathetic interest wholly removed from the impersonal attitude of the mere on-looker, with something of an individual association with his exciting career and its victories and defeats.

John Barrymore invests the character of Beresford Cruger, the young American, with a lovable naturalness and with a degree of reality and ideality difficult to resist. The play is very tender and very human. "An American Citizen" is not only true to his flag, but also to himself and his public.

GOSSIP

The Moving Picture World had a really beautiful word-painting in its Christmas Message in the last issue. It succeeded in filling the Yuletide greeting with a sweet sincerity and tenderness. Such pretty sentiment cannot even be correspondingly congratulated.

A Message from the Sales Manager.

To Film Men—everywhere:

There is no season of the year more appropriate than the present for the Sales Manager to express a few words of appreciation to the courageous and enterprising gentlemen who possessed sufficient confidence and conviction to become associated with the most gigantic and important feature film program ever conceived.

To every one of you, and to every other individual who has in any manner aided you in realizing the inspiring success which your efforts and your energies have earned, we extend heartiest wishes for a real, jolly, Merry Christmas, and a prosperous, happy New Year.

"THE HEART OF A GIPSY"

For Release Tuesday, January 13, 1914

Krisia, a gipsy girl, is maltreated by her drunken father and wanders away from the encampment. Olga, a tiny Countess of seven years, adopts Krisia as her sister and the two grow up in sisterly affection.

A time comes when Krisia, now budded into beautiful womanhood, grows madly enamored of Olga's fiance. Torn between devotion to Olga and love for Randolph, Krisia finally appeals to her father whom she has located through detective agencies and who is at that time camping near the villa. The gipsy visits her the night of the betrothal and, being left alone for a moment, steals some silver spoons, and Krisia, awake to the utter hopelessness of help from him, sends him away. A moment later Randolph enters and wraps her in his arms, declaring his love for her, but his inability to break the wedding engagement at so late a date.

A week later Olga and Randolph are married and Krisia, bravely fighting back the tears, watches the gaily-draped wedding barque as it slips down the river, and, flinging a "God Bless You" after them, turns her head towards the western horizon where the setting sun silhouettes the tents of a gipsy encampment. Ten minutes later she is in her father's arms, with the old life fast fading away.

Facts and Comments

AT the close of the year a brief retrospect seems timely. As motion picture history shapes itself, a period of twelve months is full of events and full of meaning. No man could have prophesied the present conditions when the now dying year was young. The changes in 1913 have in many respects been revolutionary. The importance of the single reel, at one time the mainstay of entertaining kinematography, has been crowded into an almost obscure corner by the arrival of hundreds upon hundreds of multiple reels, of which at this time there seems to be no end. They have made the motion picture entertainment more pretentious and perhaps more fashionable, but they have undoubtedly detracted from its "infinite variety." It is idle to predict how the situation will clarify at last. At present there is much confusion and many exhibitors are confronted with new and unexpected phases of competition.

There seems to have been an inflation of the feature market. The great feature wave seems to be slowly receding. The demand for superheated productions is obviously falling off. To a discerning eye there never was any genuine demand for multiple reels just because they were multiple reels; audiences are more discriminating than ever before, and they have learned to distinguish between a truly extraordinary production and one which was only called so by the producers and their press agents. It is certain that the great spectacular features will retain their popularity; feature making will develop into an art of its own. We expect to see greater features in 1914 than we saw in 1913.

No less striking than the changes in the pictures have been the changes in the personnel of the men who are engaged in the exhibiting of motion pictures. They have established higher standards for the conduct of their business, they are recruited from the best classes in the community. Take the owners of the new type of improved motion picture theaters. Comparatively few of them are managerial graduates of the speaking stage. Not a few of them are old exhibitors who have kept pace with the expansion of the industry. They started with small houses, often with a capacity of less than three hundred, and by their energy and their progressiveness have been able to build new theaters with often five times the seating capacity of their first little theater. The art of presenting the picture, beginning with proper projection, has gone forward with rapid strides. The influence of the model theater is felt thousands of miles away. Compare the cheapest and humblest show of today with the same type of show two or three years ago and you cannot fail to notice the many improvements.

Most gratifying is the progress made by the motion picture in the esteem of the public. The best evidence of this may be found in the changed attitude of the daily press. A couple of years ago the sanctum of the dramatic critic on the daily paper was locked and barred against the motion picture. If the picture received any notice at all it was the unflattering attention of the man who runs the funny department, so called. Occasionally a ponderous paragraph would speak of it with much complacency and little wit. The poor picture was a waif in journalistic eyes and its devotees were objects of divided pity and censure. Today the motion picture section of the daily newspaper is treading close upon the heels of the regular theatrical department.

We should not let the year pass by without a word of very hearty and grateful recognition of the great credit due to the artists of the screen. These men and women, often underpaid and misunderstood, can take no inspiration and no pleasure out of the applause of their audiences; the glories of the footlights and the thrill that comes to the artist as he looks into a sea of admiring sympathetic faces can never be theirs. Nevertheless their fame is greater than that of the most widely known actor of the speaking stage, and their opportunities of cheering their vast audiences and bringing sunshine into all the little dark corners of the world are enviable. They often work in surroundings and under circumstances that are not at all conducive to inspiration. In such moments it is hard for them to look beyond the present, which always seems like a defeat, and conjure up in their imagination the millions to whom their work gives pleasure. The motion picture brings its daily message of consolation to all who are unduly burdened. Little mothers, lonesome men and women in the great cities, the drudges of the household, the workshop and the farm, the dwellers in the lowliest tenements, are the most faithful and the most grateful worshippers at the motion picture theaters. In this age of service from man to man the thought of pleasing so deserving an audience ought to prove a source of perpetual inspiration.

Big Changes Taking Place.

By Louis Reeves Harrison

"LUCKY Accidents" are men called who have attained wealth or prominence in the motion-picture field, who might easily have remained comparatively poor and obscure but for the tremendous popularity of the New Art. This is not so just as it may seem. There was no established basis for faith in the business at the outset; there were wide and deep differences of opinion as to its ultimate success; there were bitter experiences and serious mistakes made before methods of production and distribution were finally shaped; there were big fundamental questions to be settled by those earliest in the manufacture and sale of picture reels.

An enormous number of intelligent men regarded the screen exhibitions with a mixture of good-natured tolerance and thinly-veiled contempt. They might do for children and the childish, but could not be considered drama, literature or a commingling of the two—they were generally considered to be a form of variety entertainment of a cheap and not-altogether-desirable kind. These many intelligent men, among them some of the ablest in the country, were convinced that the popularity of screen representations constituted a fad, a passing whim, that would not last. Only a small group really foresaw the future development of the New Art and the power it would exercise as a social and educational factor.

In that group were men of undoubted ability, men of initiative who were bound to rise, but many of them tried to make pictures according to methods already discarded in older arts, and a frightful lot of commonplace was the result. With a few and far between redeeming exceptions, the film releases sown broadcast over our helpless public were monotonously ugly, utterly silly, and offensive to public taste, but those few illustrious exceptions set a standard that has swiftly advanced to greater heights, and some of the finest monuments of recent times may serve as guides to production for many years to come.

The pioneers of this country were, for the most part, rude men, who knew how to clear the way for those who have settled down to enjoy peace and prosperity. So, many pioneers in the New Art were of rude material, intent on immediate advantage, with little or no conception of ultimate advantages to come, but it must not be forgotten that they were without the accumulated experience of past ages, selected achievements handed down by predecessors, commonly known as tradition. There was no such thing as a reference library of visualized classics.

They turned to the classics of literature and drama, narrative and symbolic fiction, stage productions of seemingly-exhausted possibilities, garbled history, until the cowboy in all his crudeness offered a modicum of fresh and vital relief. He was almost the first living and breathing thing of modernity that was photographed in motion. He became a figure of importance for many reasons, not the least of which was his liberty of movement and that contempt for ancient rules and principles which enters into the constitution of every live and progressive male on earth.

As it happens, however, we are not a race of cowboys, and this particular type does not fully respond to our passionate desire for self-expression. It is also becoming known that the cattle puncher of fact is not quite so representative of national spirit as the gentleman of fringed trousers fancifully pictured on the screen. Our illusions about him are fast fading. He is too obviously of the hothouse studio variety, of New York and Los Angeles training and gasoline wagon proclivities. His ease of manner when called upon to wear a dress suit has created a gulf between the man and his most distinctive impersonation.

The individual who commits a crime of heroism or tells a noble lie is more to our taste. Our inherent sense of justice, having expanded in generosity while the judiciary seems to retard rather than advance human progress, has made us considerate of human weakness in many of its forms and inclined to throw off the icy hands of precedence and legal procedure. I do not know of any audience more generally representative of national opinion than that of the moving picture show, and its sympathy for the big-hearted outlaw has a decided significance.

By gradual steps, and perhaps by logical ones, the screen play slowly emerged from its crude materialism with a dissatisfied reaching out for ideals. Leaders among those who were in at the birth of the New Art are beginning to cast about for the best that creative talent has to offer, instead of depending, as fiction magazines did at one time, upon staff-made stories. People want something better and in greater variety than those who measure up films in the studios, engaged as they are in a form of publishing business, can find time and opportunity to turn out. Screen publication of dramatic and entertaining stories is about to be done on a tremendous scale, and every live producer feels that in order to put forth his full strength he must respond to splendid ideals which are shaping society and political institutions the world over.

While no bloody revolution looms up among the millions who support the picture shows, there is a growing and widespread revolt of intelligence against unintelligent codes and creeds, as is manifest in the leading periodicals of the day. There is already a call for the critical and constructive worker with visible ideas, fresh and definite ideas, the kind of ideas that have made the human being grow since he was conceived in the Womb of Time.

Big changes are taking place—that is plain enough to all who see with the mind—and a steady advance is necessary if the art is to keep place with the people—nothing can resist them. "Our people are just now intent on making life more wholesome and happy for the less fortunate and helpless members of society," says one of the most brilliant writers of the day. "The country is filled with organizations formed expressly for the purpose of doing good to somebody." It would appear that the greatest appeal that could be made to such a people must be one that is essentially humanizing.

It does not make much difference whether the average man of today is suspiciously rich or respectably poor, nothing is too good for him—he wants the best Life has to offer. The public will patronize the show that has the best program; the exhibitor will soon be hot after that program, and it can not be filled with what is no longer of interest, with either literary or theatrical holdovers that have nothing in them to stir the pulse or set the mind aflame with new thoughts. The average man is interested in the big games that are being played, whether participant or merely a spectator. Competition excites rather than alarms him; he enjoys nothing more keenly than watching one force matched against another. Here is given a mere glimpse of his ideals—the big changes taking place are so many attempted responses to those ideals.

"The Previous Restraint"

By W. Stephen Bush

AT this moment no greater service can be rendered to the motion picture interests than the raising of a cry of alarm against the evils of censorship which may overwhelm us even before the new year will be well under way.

The dangers are no longer theoretical. I have been face to face with a real censorship law, I have examined its effects in the few weeks of its enforcement. Nothing stands now between the industry and its most deadly enemy but the hope of a Federal injunction. If this hope fails, one state in the Union will suffer incalculable harm, the leak in the bulwark of liberty will grow to a torrent and it will take years before the damage can be repaired. There will be a depression in the motion picture industry the like of which we have never known before.

Every man engaged in the industry can well afford to drop for the moment all other concerns and ponder well the menace which is now at our very doors.

What do you suppose would happen to the newspapers of the country and to the country itself if the press had to submit to a previous restraint before being allowed to circulate among the people. In less than twenty-four hours the disturbance in our national life would be felt from coast to coast, the value of newspapers would fall like a load of iron dropped from the tower of the Woolworth Building, every avenue of public service would be clogged up.

Do you believe that the motion picture will suffer less from this tyrannical curb of previous restraint. Mark the words well. The proposition is not to punish you for displaying a picture which is an offense against the law. Censorship goes very much further: it wants to tell you what picture you can run and what picture you cannot run, and it assumes to dictate to you in advance. That is what "previous restraint" means. What are you producers going to do if a few men and an occasional fanatic in petticoats have it in their power to make your negative practically worthless by forbidding the display of your positives in a dozen states or more. What subjects can you find, what art can you develop if even your best and noblest efforts may be suppressed through the whimsical ukase of a censor board? How do you exchange men expect to sell or lease your prints if a censor board has the power to mutilate a subject beyond recognition and makes a jumble of it which nobody cares to look at and which is neither fish nor flesh nor good red herring, and how do you exhibitors propose to entertain your public with a lot of fanatics constantly interfering with your entertainment?

You cannot get away from this fact, as obvious as it is significant: Censorship in every age and in every country has never been anything but an instrument of oppression and bigotry. The entering wedge has come in Ohio. It is quite possible that a little pruning and a little cutting here and there might do the picture some good, and we all believe that two of the censors in Ohio are disposed to be fair and honest. What about their successors and what about the appointees in other states. Even the best of men cannot be entrusted with arbitrary power. It is human nature to abuse such power.

If this official censorship, this blasting "previous restraint," is permitted to exist, the influence of producer, distributor and exhibitor will dwindle to nothing and all the power will pass into the hands of the censor. The man who can say, "Nothing shall go on this screen until I have approved of it," is the man who dominates the situation. He can make or break the producer. He will determine the standards and the ethics of the art, and no one can earn a penny unless he renders obedience to the censoring autocrat. If he is a fanatic, you must try to guess, and suffer every time you guess wrongly, or rather differently, and if he is a corrupt politician you have to buy him. Let us beware of the beginning of this evil; crush it now or it will crush you later.

The very fact that we have forty-eight separate and distinct sovereign jurisdictions in this country increases the horrors of censorship and will strike the whole art and industry like a palsy. It is inconceivable that forty-eight sovereign states will adopt exactly the same legislation. Some of the brightest minds of the nation have for more than five generations endeavored to remedy the evils of conflicting divorce legislation. Congresses have been held for procuring a substantially uniform divorce law and these congresses have been attended by delegates of the various states. They were men and women of the highest type of intelligence and inspired by the noblest of motives—the protection of the family. What is the sum total of all their achievements? Exactly nothing at all. The divorce laws are as different as ever and, humanly speaking, there is no chance that they will ever be uniform. It will be just precisely the same with the state censorships. Ohio will approve what Indiana rejects and vice versa. Chaos and confusion will reign supreme. Capital which is now everywhere anxious to support motion pictures and to affiliate with motion picture enterprises will take the alarm. Where is the producer who can please forty-eight different states and three times forty-eight different censors? What is to become of a subject in which Scene 5 must be cut in Pennsylvania and Scene 9 must be eliminated in Michigan, etc., etc. They might allow kissing in New Jersey, order it out in Delaware, let it stay in while the print is in Maryland, allow just a flash of it in Virginia and cut it out again in Tennessee. An elopement might be tolerated in Texas, frowned on in Missouri and cause the rejection of the entire picture in Alabama. No need of multiplying examples of the absurdities of censorship.

We cannot afford to be supine and indifferent any longer. The men who have started the fight against the common enemy deserve something more than our kind approval and a word or two of encouragement. The whole great moving picture army must be mobilized and face the cohorts of censorship wherever they can be found. The men who have made great fortunes out of the motion pictures ought to be willing to supply the sinews of war wherever and whenever necessary. The exhibitors ought to go on record everywhere against official censorship.

Whether the decision in the Federal Court is for us or against us the fight will not be finished, it has just begun. If the Ohio law is declared constitutional, the grafting politicians of every state will follow the motion picture like a pack of hungry wolves. Let us make no compromise. We do not want to depend on the protection of a political bargain. We must insist on nothing less than the freedom of the screen subject to no restraint except such as the laws now on the statute books impose on the press. Not a cent for tribute but the most generous appropriation for defense and the maintenance of our rights.

As one exhibitor put it: "We exhibitors do not want to corrupt the public, we need no legal guardian to tell us what to do."

No previous restraint.

The First American Censors.

Who They Are and How They Work—Mrs. Maude Murray Miller, the Woman Member of the Board Talks Freely—Sentiment Among Exhibitors Is Strongly Against the Censorship Law.

By W. Stephen Bush.

Columbus, Dec. 22nd, 1913.

I HAVE interviewed the first official censors known to American history the first censors whom a sovereign state pays to sit in judgment upon the morality of their fellows. They are known in the terms of the law as "a board of censors of motion picture films." If you show any motion pictures in the state of Ohio which, is in the judgment and discretion of the board of censors, "otherwise than moral, educational, or amusing and harmless," you are liable to be fined "not less than twenty-five dollars nor more than three hundred dollars, or imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year, or both, for each offense." As Mrs. Maude Murray Miller, the woman member of the board, pointed out an exhibitor showing an unapproved picture in Ohio might easily accumulate a life sentence if he runs a continuous show from 10 A. M. to 11 P. M.

Pen Pictures of the Screen Bosses.

I found the three censors to be composed of substantially the same clay which seems to have been used to fashion the rest of the population of Ohio. Indeed not one of the three makes any claim of superiority. They are, with the exception of Mrs. Maude Murray Miller, rather apologetic about the functions of their office.

The Board of Censors as appointed by the Industrial Commission of Ohio is composed of Mr. J. A. Maddox, Mr. H. E. Vestal and Mrs. Maude Murray Miller. Mr. Maddox, who is the chairman of the board, I found to be a man of good intelligence and pleasant manners, possessed, in a marked degree, of those advantages which come with a newspaper training. He is apparently in the early thirties, and has had experience both in the journalistic field and in the world of amusements. For years he has been actively engaged in the motion picture business as an exhibitor and his sympathies are plainly enough with the exhibitor. I can readily believe that the scant salary of a censor could have been no inducement to Mr. Maddox to accept such a thankless task. He says that he took the position because he felt he could exercise its duties with better advantage to the industry than a mere place-hunting politician.

"The plan of state censorship," he said, "took root in the threatening evils of municipal censorship from which, for instance, such cities as Cleveland and Cincinnati had suffered severely. This present censorship law was drafted to prevent every little town or city to set up a censorship of its own. Such a condition would have been unbearable. Now that we have a censorship law for the state, the cities that had local censorship have abolished their local censors and they are willing to accept our censorship. It is true that the cities with a home-rule charter do not have to accept our censorship: they may set up a censorship of their own; they may have the legal right to do so, but it is most unlikely that they will."

"Are you doing any censoring at present?" I asked.

"No; we are not doing anything at present. The restraining order of the federal judges exempts the patrons of the Mutual from the operation of the law and, in all fairness, we suspend the law for everybody else as well. We have so far censored in all about 8,000 reels or about 1,500 subjects of the General Film, and about half that number for the Universal. The percentage of total rejections has been very low, perhaps fifteen in all. Eliminations have been ordered in about 10 per cent. of the films examined. We charge for duplicates the same as for originals, and in case of eliminations to be made in duplicates we take the promise of the branch manager. The money paid to us comes in checks drawn to the order of the State Treasurer of Ohio.

"It has been said that your work in examining so many films in so short a time has been rather remarkable."

"Well," answered Mr. Maddox, with a smile, "you must remember that Mr. Vestal and I had seen a large number of reels before and thus we could safely depend on our memories. It is not correct to say that we threatened to censor the Mutual films. Being in Cleveland and anxious to facilitate matters, we invited the Mutual to have their films examined while we were on the ground."

"What standards," I asked, "have you established to determine whether a film is moral, educational or amusing and harmless in character?"

"We have established no definite standard; each film must stand on its own merits. We want to be liberal and we take into consideration the property rights in the matter. We know what the loss of five or six prints mean to the manufacturer and we are always anxious to give him the benefit of every possible doubt. I am glad that this matter has been taken into the courts; the exhibitor wants to know where he stands, and if this present law is declared void much will have been done to clear the situation.

The Child and Censorship.

Mr. Maddox thought a while and then continued very earnestly:

"Do you know what is at the bottom of all the censorship agitation? I will tell you: it is the child and the mother of the child. If there were no motion picture theaters in the residential sections, where children compose so large a part of the audience there would be none of this demand for censorship. The mother of a child is horrified by a scene which no child should ever be allowed to see and she calls up the police captain and demands immediate action. Why, right here in Columbus, in the downtown business districts, there are shows far more objectionable than any picture house would dare to put on and there is no outcry or protest of any kind. Why? Because no children go there. I do not know what is in the minds of some of these directors when they make a picture showing how a child is poisoned by ratsbane being put on a biscuit."

In answer to questions, Mr. Maddox said that an approval of a film by one member of the board was the act of the whole board, but that in rejections he would want the decision to be made by all the members. He did not say that he was in favor of the principle of censorship, but intimated that he looked upon it rather in the light of a useful expedient. He said he knew that the exhibitors were now all against it, but he pointed out that not a voice was raised against it at the convention. He thought the change of heart was due to the influence of the exchanges. I had been told that Mr. Maddox had been approached with an offer to manage a large theater and that he was seriously considering his resignation as censor. Mr. Maddox would not deny that this was a fact.

How the Scheme Works.

When asked about the method of work pursued by the censors, Mr. Maddox said that he had employed a large clerical force and that each group of producers was given a convenient allotment of numbers. He said he had devised this system after consulting with managers of all exchanges shipping into Ohio. Separate records were kept of approvals and of rejections and all eliminations were set forth clearly. Daily reports were made by the board. At present all the exchanges and exhibitors have discontinued using the "leaders" sent out by the board. These "leaders" contain the words: Approved by the Ohio Board of Censors," the number of the approval as registered in the office of the board and the seal of the State of Ohio. The reading matter is printed on a miniature map of Ohio. During my stay in Cleveland and Columbus I visited at least two score of motion picture theaters, but the Ohio stamp of approval was nowhere to be seen. Here is a facsimile of an "Approval":

The form and wording of the rejection is the same as in approval, but for the word "not" before "approved."

Many thousand feet of undistributed "leaders" are now waiting on the shelves of the office of the commission for the decision of the federal judges.

I found the second member of the board, Mr. H. E. Vestal, a man of experience in the motion picture field. He is an exhibitor conducting a motion picture show in Ada, a small town not far from Columbus. Mr. Vestal impressed me as a conscientious man in lively sympathy with every effort for the making of the best and the cleanest pictures. He professes a desire to be liberal, and he is sincere beyond a doubt, but inclined, perhaps, to lose sight of the fact that tastes will differ to the end of time, and that from a showman's point of view even the coarser taste may be catered to provided common decency is observed. Like Mr. Maddox, he claimed that no hard and fast rules of morality had been adopted by the board, and that each picture must be judged on its own individual merits. He did not approve of the comparison of the motion picture with the newspaper, because he said the motion picture gave a far more vivid visualization of things than reports in the papers could give, therefore, he thought should be under different and stricter control than the newspaper. He, too, knew of the growing opposition to censorship among the exhibitors. While he firmly believed that the censorship law would be upheld, he said that a decision to the contrary would clear the situation just as well, and certainly, as to his legal status, that was what the exhibitor wanted and had a right to expect. Mr. Vestal is opposed to all depiction of criminal violence and of indecent dances, and he is especially outspoken in his condemnation of disgusting scenes in bar-rooms and dives. He said he did not object to the portrayal on the screen of a respectable drinking place, but there were hardly any such places in motion pictures; there were always disreputable dives where men and women acted in the most vulgar way imaginable and where gambling was carried on and criminal plots were hatched. He said that when he and his colleagues had to censor such a great quantity of films in so short a time he found the comments in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD very useful as refreshers of his memory.

In the Office of the Board.

I walked with Mr. Vestal from his hotel to the office of the Board of Censors, which is at present a very modest one-room affair situated above the Rose Theater. Two stenographers were at work in the office. The only furniture was a desk, a writing-table, a couple of typewriting machines and a steel case for the undistributed leaders. Mr. Vestal explained to me that the viewing and censoring of the pictures was done in the Rose Theater, a small house located on the ground floor. He said they had very little to do just now, though they were ready to examine films at any time. Only an occasional feature man drops in, and he is turned over to Mrs. Maude Murray Miller, who makes a specialty of censoring features. As Mr. Maddox had been away in Cleveland and Mr. Vestal had been in delicate health while Mrs. Miller had been in Chicago censoring 200 reels of Kinemacolor film for admission into Ohio, the triumvirate of censors has had little chance to get together and formulate rules. It has, however, made this grand division of labor, i. e., that Mrs. Miller is to censor the features, principally, while the two men will do the bulk of the censoring for the organized groups of the producers.

There are inquiries about censorship of motion pictures piled high on the desk of the Ohio board. Inquiries have come from Texas, from Missouri, from California, from Michigan and from New Jersey. The crop of motion picture censors for 1914 threatens to break all records and to be a source of no small loss and annoyance to the industry.

If censorship were a question of individuals instead of principles, the type of men represented in the Ohio board might do no great harm and might possibly do some good. As an advisory committee to producers, such men as Maddox and Vestal might be useful. They are experienced, practical exhibitors with commendably high ideals. The clothing of a man with arbitrary powers is, however, bound to lead to injustice and oppression, and this is true no matter how good the intentions of the man may be.

Mr. Vestal realizes that under the home-rule charter law the establishment of local censorships is quite possible, but he considers it highly improbable. He thinks that if the law is sustained, at least one more censor must be created because the weekly output of about 175 reels is too much for three persons, even if there were no accumulations of old reels to be attended to. In the last three weeks or more the General Film and the Universal have submitted none of their product and there are about 5,000 reels on the shelves of the Mutual untouched by censorial hands.

Picturesque Mrs. Maude Murray Miller.

As if Providence or the Law of Averages had meant to supply a contrast to the practical and conservative male censors it causes the appointment of Mrs. M. M. Miller. Mrs. Miller is connected with a Columbus newspaper, for which she edits a "human progress department." I met the lady as she returned to her sanctum from an address she had made to some Jewish society. The topic had been "The Necessity of Censoring Motion Pictures." Somewhat diffidently I asked the lady for her ideas of censorship and for an explanation of her methods of enforcing the law. Having proffered my request, I fell into the attitude of an attentive listener, and Mrs. Miller made it easy for me to continue in this role to the end.

"I have been put here," she began, "by the Governor of Ohio to protect the women and children of Ohio. Ohio wants censorship, and the whole state is back of us. I have seen so many pictures of the vilest description that I was ashamed to think men and women would pose for such pictures. The Governor is anxious for me to go out and address people and give them the right idea about censorship; some persons have wrong ideas on the subject. Why, everybody wants censorship, the moving picture men most of all. Attorney General Hogan has told me there is no doubt that the law is constitutional, in spite of the fact that the Mutual people have filed this injunction against us. Why, other film men have been perfectly lovely about this, but the Mutual has shown small respect for Ohio. Of course, we want to be as just as possible to everybody, even to the Mutual, but I think we will censor the other companies first and we cannot be expected to take up their old releases, do you think so?"

As the question was evidently a rhetorical one not meant to be answered, I persevered in silence, which was broken a second later as soon as the lady's organs of respiration had been permitted a fleeting rest.

"Ohio," resumed Mrs. Miller, with vibrant energy, "will not be prevented from establishing this censorship. It is the Governor's pet measure, he believes in it, and he has put me here out of all the women of Ohio."

Mrs. Miller was reasonably free from torturing doubts as to her own importance in the universal scheme of things and in the Ohio sub-division thereof.

"Oh, I am not opposed to good motion pictures. 'Quo Vadis?' is all right, although if it were not a classic I should cut a good deal out of it, for you know there is murder, seduction, abduction and debauchery, not to mention suicide. Such things I would, of course, eliminate from a modern feature. I believe in the classic, for instance, 'Monte Christo,' by Victor Hugo—no—no, you are right, Dumas, and I did not—no, I am pretty sure I did not cut a single thing out of 'Queen Elizabeth.'"

I tried to look my appreciation of this marvelous abstention from film surgery, and Mrs. Miller, possibly dreading an interruption, went on:

"I like to censor films, and, knowing my familiarity with the classics, the men on the board have turned all the features over to me. Some of these feature men plead hard with me when I reject their pictures. One young man was completely broken up when I told him that Ohio would not have his feature. I told him to go to another state, but he said if the thing was too bad for Ohio, no other state would want to touch it. Why, if this law is declared unconstiutional it will be the worst thing in the world. The ladies of every city and town and village of Ohio will go to the mayor or the chief of police and ask for permission to censor the motion pictures. They will get the permission, too."

I left the presence of Mrs. Miller with visions of a new Carrie Nation at the head of a band of militants raiding the motion picture theaters and nailing Mr. Hennesy's scalp to the door of the mythical censor congress.

The Sentiment of Exhibitors Against the Law.

I cannot bid good-bye to Columbus without a word of praise and admiration for the spirit of cheerful coöperation which characterizes the exhibitors here. Mr. J. W. Swain, part owner of two big and prosperous theaters and president of the local branch of organized exhibitors; out of fifty odd exhibitors in the city, forty-five are members. Mr. Swain said the evils of local censorship as depicted to him by others had at first inclined him favorably toward the law, but now not only he but the members of the local were opposed to it. He said he could not see how any good could come to the exhibitor through such a law. With the great change for the better which had taken place in the great body of exhibitors censorship was not needed. Because they are a strong united body, the Columbus exhibitors enforce the rule of three reels for five cents with great advantage to themselves and with entire satisfaction to the public.

I commented upon the refined appearance of the fronts of the Columbus theaters, and the total absence of lurid posters.

"Well," said Mr. Swain, "it's this way. The two or three men that came in here and started lurid posters and ran so-called features like 'Jesse James' and 'Deadwood Dick' could get no foothold here. We went right on conducting our shows in a clean, progressive way, giving our patrons every comfort and attention and keeping our lobbies free from drunks and our fronts the same. The fly-by-night men never lasted longer than a few weeks. This business is now getting on a more solid and respectable basis every day and the best people come to see our show."

Edison Touches Popular Chord

Success of the "Mary" Series Induces Manager Plimpton to Continue the Idea on Large Scale.

SOMEWHAT more than a year ago the Edison Company was induced to undertake the production of a serial picture story in collaboration with The Ladies' World, under the title of "What Happened to Mary." According to the plan one picture of the series appeared each month in conjunction with and visualizing a story of the same title which was published in the magazine. The success of the plan was remarkable. Exhibitors all over the country eagerly sought the "Mary" pictures and advertised them widely, creating great interest not only in the pictures themselves, but in the magazine story as well with the result that the publishers of The Ladies' World enthusiastically acknowledge the value of the plan as a circulation builder and the Edison Company attributes to it a considerable increase in the demand for its product.

Following up this success the Edison Company has decided to put out several serial pictures, some of which have been issued already and others are scheduled to appear at an early date, bringing the number up to six in all. The first of the serials to appear is entitled "The Chronicles of Cleek," a series of detective stories written by Thomas W. Hanshew, which will be issued in collaboration with Short Stories, a well-known magazine. In this series Benjamin Ben F. Wilson.

F. Wilson will appear as "Hamilton Cleek," a detective. The "Cleek" series will be directed by George Lessey.

Mr. Wilson has been with the Edison players for several years appearing in the pictures taken in Bermuda and on a transcontinental trip across the Canadian Rockies. He was also with the company that spent the winter of 1912-12 in California. He has appeared in many of the "What Happened to Mary" series. Prior to joining the Edison players, Mr. Wilson gained a considerable reputation as a legitimate actor with the Spooner Stock Company and with the forces of Wagenhalls & Kemper.

"The Chronicles of Cleek" began with the release of November 25, 1913, under the title of "The Vanishing Cracksman" and will appear on the last Tuesday of each month thereafter.

The second of the serials is entitled "The Sentimental Experiences of Wood B. Wedd," which began with the subject, "Her Face Was Her Fortune," released December 29, 1913. As will be gleaned from the title,

C. Jay Williams.

Wood B. Wedd has an overweaning desire for matrimony, which leads him to propose marriage upon the slightest provocation. This penchant, as might be guessed, leads him into most distressing complications. It is rare comedy. Mark Swan, a popular writer of short stories, has been engaged to write the scenarios for this series. William Wadsworth, already a popular Edison player, takes the part of "Wood B. Wedd." He has had a wide dramatic experience and has appeared in many successful stage plays. As a photoplayer his forte seems to be comedy parts, in which he has already won an enviable reputation.

Andy Clark.

The director of this series is C. Jay Williams, who has to his credit a long string of those delightful comedies for which the Edison Company has become justly famous.

"Andy's Adventures" is the title of the third of the serials, which began with the release of December 31, 1913, entitled "Andy Gets a Job." Andy Clark, who is to play the leading role, is a clever boy and has already done some very creditable work as a picture player. As "Andy of the pictures," he is the little hero who has come to the aid of his widowed mother in the support of a growing family. Little tragedies of this character are familiar to everyone and the series is certain to strike a responsive chord in the hearts of photoplay fans. Subsequent releases of this series will be on the second Wednesday of each month.

Charles Francis.

Andy Slark has no previous theatrical training to help or hinder him in his new art. He is just a freckled-face boy with all the likes and dislikes of boyhood for the amenities and formalities of life. He is absolutely indifferent to the camera and goes about his work as though it was the one aim of his existence. He is sure to have a strong appeal.

For the "Andy" series Charles Francis has been selected as director and his painstaking care for the niceties of picture production will be apparent in every release. Alice Williams writes the scenarios.

Barry O'Moore.

Fourth among the serials is "Octavius—Amateur Detective." This is a burlesque upon the detective story and begins with the "Affair of the Actress's Jewels," to be released January 12, and upon the third Monday of each month thereafter. This series will be published in conjunction with a story in the Pictorial Review and the stories will be written by Frederick Arnold Kummer.

Barry O'Moore takes the part of Octavius. Mr. O'Moore is well known to all familiar with Edison pictures, having appeared in a number of the best that company has produced. As "Octavius" he is a young man who has suddenly come into wealth and decides to make a study of the detection of crime. In the entangling of crime plots and in dealing with desperate criminals his efforts are as startling as they are amusing.

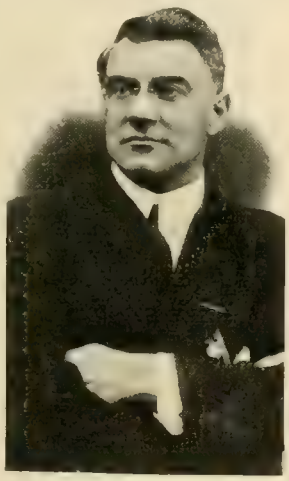
As director of this series Charles Seay will have an opportunity to full play to his fun-loving disposition and the stunts cut out for "Octavius" to perform will lose nothing by reason of his direction. Mr. Seay has many excellent pictures pictures to his credit and his long connection with the work as writer and player as well as director assure a finished product. There will be lots of laughs connected with the affairs of "Octavius."

Mary Fuller.

Anything we might say about Mary Fuller would seem almost superfluous, beyond the fact that it is necessary to record that she is scheduled to appear in one of the serials. Her work in "What Happened to Mary" and "Who Will Marry Mary," is what put the seal of final approval upon the original idea. To her enthusiasm and earnest effort the success of those series was largely due, so it would be a tactical mistake to think of producing further serials if she was not included in some one of them. Undoubtedly the Edison folks recognize that fact for they have made a place for Mary in one of the best of the series. "Dolly of the Dailies" is to be the title and Mary is to be "Dolly." The stories will be written by Acton Davies, than whom there are few others better qualified to write the scenarios for such a series of pictures as are contemplated.



Walter Edwin.

Dolly is to be a newspaper woman. She is to come to New York without any previous experience in newspaper work or with the least knowledge of the big city, and she is to work out her own salvation against odds known only to those who have tried to break into the metropolitan newspaper field. Mr. Davies has been connected with New York newspaperdom for many years and has been an eyewitness to many tragedies of this sort, so he will write by the book, as it were. Given some real happenings to depict and Mary Fuller to enliven them with her strong personality, and you have a combination that, for picture production, will be hard to equal. Then add to this the keen preceptions possessed by Walter Edwin, who has been selected to direct this series and we may reasonably expect something quite out of the ordinary.

The first "Dolly" picture will be released January 31 and will continue thereafter to appear on the last Saturday of each month.

Still another—a sixth—serial picture is scheduled to be made by the Edison Company. Details are not yet ready for publication beyond the fact that Marc MacDermott will be the leading player. But it is sure to be something good or Mr. MacDermott would not be chosen for the leading role. Wait and see.

It will be noticed that the Edison Company have departed somewhat from the usual in selecting the leading players for its serials. Femininity has almost uniformly been selected to bear the heavier burden of popularizing the picture; but the Edison program is strong for men and of all the six serials but one will feature a woman. It will be interesting to note just how successful the plan proves to be. The matinee idol is not unknown to the pictures, however, so it is suspected that no mistake has been made in casting the most popular of the Edison young men for leading parts.

In this connection we publish engravings of the leading players and the directors for each serial, together with scenes from four of the first releases.

This new Edison program may also be taken as that company's answer to the question of multiple reels. It contradicted a mistaken announcement to the effect that it was to add another multiple release to its weekly output and this rogram makes apparent the fact that there will be no place in the calendar for subjects of more than one reel in length for some time to come beyond the one they now issue every Friday.

PRINCELY CHRISTMAS GIFT FOR PICTURE MEN.

"Pop" Rock Has Splendid Gold Dinner Sets Made for Three of His Friends.

Everybody who passed down Liberty Street, New York City, just before Christmas, stopped in front of the International Silver Company's display window to gaze at a rich, gold dinner set. It was one of three that "Pop" Rock, of the Vitagraph Company, ordered, and it was a Christmas gift. One of the three was given to Mr. J. Stewart Blackton, another to Mr. A. E. Smith, both his partners, and the third was for Mr. Siegmund Lubin. Many a poet in the old princely days had written of the beauty of such gifts as these and put them into some saga or epic song of emperors and kings. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD is writing the epic of the motion picture business; every week we get out a canto, and it is sure that we mustn't go to press without duly recording the beauty and loveliness of these dinner sets. We can easily guess at the pleasure of the lucky friends of "Pop" Rock who received them.

Each set comprises 540 individual pieces—plates, candlesticks, knives, forks, spoons, etc. They are of solid gold and designed in simple, graceful curves, full of dignity. Mr. Rock declined to tell us how much they cost, but we will venture a guess that $2,000 would be small. Each set is in a mahogany chest, in itself a thing of beauty.

NOTED AUTHORS TO WRITE FOR MUTUAL.

In its effort to raise the standard of moving pictures, the Mutual Film Corporation has contracted for the stories by many of the most prominent authors of novels and magazine stories and they will be condensed into scenario form and produced under the direction of D. W. Griffith. Among the authors whose work has been contracted for are: Thomas Nelson Page, ambassador to Italy; Paul Armstrong, playwright, whose drama, "The Escape," a romance of the underworld is now being produced by Mr. Griffith personally; John Kendrick Bangs, George A. Birmingham, who wrote that very successful Irish comedy "General John Regan," now playing in a long run at the Hudson Theater, New York; Daniel Carson Goodman, author of "Hagar Revelly," the publication of which Anthony Comstock attempted to prevent; Zona Gale, Eleanor Ingram, author of "The Car Behind"; Robert H. Davis, of the Munsey Magazines; Paul West, of the New York World; H. R. Durant, playwright and associate editor of "The Cavalier"; Gardner Hunting, editor of the People's Magazine; Homer Croy, the humorist of Judge, Leslie's and Collier's; George Pattullo and Roy Norton, both of whom are famous writers of Western stories; E. Phillips Oppenheim, the celebrated English novelist; Mary Roberts Rinehart and Roy McCardell.

The Third Degree.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

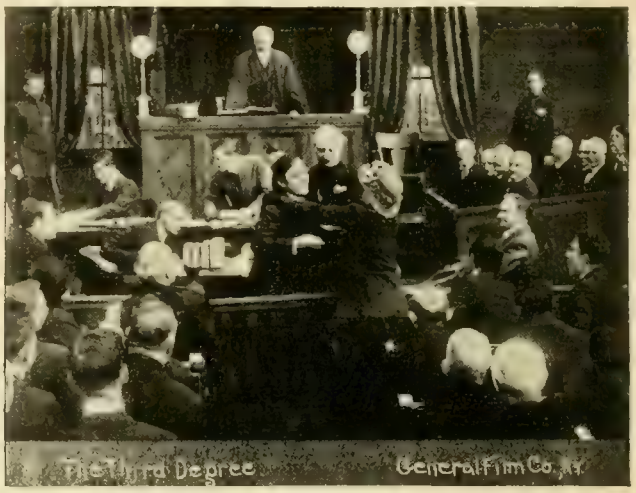
FOLLOWING its new program of regularly releasing big, multiple reel stories, the General Film Company is now ready to present Charles Klein's popular melodrama "The Third Degree." This play attracted a great deal of attention and had a gratifying run as a Broadway success; it was one of the hits of its season. The picture was produced by the Lubin Company under the direction of Barry O'Neil. It is in five reels and has been carried over to the screen with a reasonable measure of success. At least it can be said that the story is there. Not evenly effective and perhaps not wholly justifying all the film used in putting it over, it is, once its situation has been stated—at the beginning of the third reel—cumulatively interesting until, at the beginning of the fifth reel, the sharp-eyed spectator can foresee the end or thinks he can. There is more interest in the fifth reel than he can foresee; but the plot at that point has grown, by comparison with what went before, a bit thin and its interest is of a lesser degree.

Scene from "The Third Degree" (Lubin).

The quality of the story must be taken into account as a valuable asset. On that alone it stands as a worth while production. The staging is as natural as life. With the picture's perfect photography, the sets and backgrounds seem just what was actually there, supposing the story as taken from life. Of the acting, we can not say much either to condemn or praise; it certainly was not what we can call brilliant. Bernard Seigel's picture of Dr. Bernstein is a bit of relief that we can notice with pleasure. In the work of Gaston Bell, as Howard, there were some fine moments; but he was uneven. George Seule Spencer, as Lawyer Brewster, like Robert Durbar, as Jefferies Sr., gave an intelligent, even picture of his part without really striking fire. The police captain, by Bartly McCullum, seemed lacking in the rough fibre of face and in the real dominating gestures needed. Carlotta Doti, as Annie, the waitress wife of Howard, was unfortunate in the moments when she turned up her nose which she was called upon to do quite often. Eloquence was needed and it seemed not adequate. Her Annie was, except in the early scenes, a rather cold-blooded person who failed to take the spectator wholly into her confidence or share her trouble with him. Lily Leslie, as the new wife of Jefferies Sr., was correct except where emotion was needed; she seemed to have none. Robert Whittier plays Underwood, the weakling suicide, acceptably; it is not a big part.

There is much naturalness in the first two reels which are used solely to state a rather complicated situation. The five important characters are made to stand out clearly without confusion. We find the two boys, Howard and Underwood, at college where Annie is waitress. Annie shines in these restaurant scenes where Howard, in a drunken spleen, insults her and then comes back and makes his apologies, which incident is the beginning of love. Underwood borrows some money from Howard after a football game, a fine scene showing an immense crowd, and then he leaves college. Howard's father is introduced with his new wife and at a party Howard introduces her to his chum Underwood, and we are shown that Mrs. Jefferies and he have been sweethearts.

In the second reel, Underwood has opened a studio where he sells curios that we soon learn are spurious and, depending on his friendship with Mrs. Jefferies, is using her name to help him make her friends his patrons. In the meantime, Howard is expelled from college and has come home with Annie as his wife. For this, his father casts him off and he is unable to get work. Underwood gets into trouble with creditors and writes a letter to Mrs. Jefferies Sr. threatening to commit suicide unless she will continue to help him in the business which she has learned is not honest. This letter is to play an important part in the plot. Howard calls to ask Underwood to repay the college loan, is drunk and falls asleep on Underwood's sofa just as Mrs. Jefferies Sr. comes, not very convincingly, to tell Underwood that his threat is nothing to her. That she may not see Howard, Underwood has placed a screen around the sofa and, when she has gone he really does shoot himself. The police find Howard, and Captain Clinton tries to make him confess himself a murderer. Dr. Bernstein is called to examine the body and notices the boy already more or less under the hypnotic sway of Clinton.



Scene from "The Third Degree" (Lubin).

The situation is now completely stated and the real story of the police method of torturing a confession out of a victim is begun. The helpless captive is in the claws of the unscrupulous captain who wants a victim. His father, when he is shown the confession wrung from Howard by lengthened torture, takes side against him and admonishes Brewster, his lawyer, to have nothing to do with the case. Mrs. Jefferies also hears of the confession and decides to keep the note secret. Annie alone is pitted against the redoubtable captain. The doctor has told her that the boy has been hypnotized and that his confession is meaningless, but lawyer Brewster refuses to see her. This state of affairs is effective in producing an emotion of concern in the spectator's heart. The poor boy's condition as Mr. Bell shows it is, with his playing in the opening scenes, his best work.

Annie's persistance at length gets her an interview with Brewster whom she succeeds in interesting. Weak Mrs. Jefferies is also cleverly brought again into the plot at this point in order that she may be frightened into thinking that she herself may be suspected of the crime if found out as the woman who visited Underwood. This, of course, is to hold off the denouement. But it is not long before she is recognized and becomes a part of the forces for the defense and the suspense is practically ended at the beginning of the fifth reel. Of course, the captain will not give in without a fight; but what chance has he if the picture is going to end in one reel? Then we have the trial, acquittal and the happy ending with everybody forgiven. It criticises the plot a bit, thus to see it thrown up so barely against a screen; but there is enough to it to hold and it deals with very interesting things.

CHANGE OF THANHOUSER "JOSEPH" TITLE.

"Joseph, Son of Jacob," the Thanhouser biblical feature, has been renamed. "Joseph in the Land of Egypt" is the final title. Eugene Moore staged the biblical play for Thanhouser, using James Cruze as Joseph and Marguerite Snow as the wife of Potiphar. "Joseph in the Land of Egypt" goes out as a four-reel Thanhouser "Big Production" on February first. Special music is again offered gratis by the Thanhouser Company, as on "Legend of Provence," "Frou Frou" and other releases in the "big productions" list.

"An Unseen Terror"

Plight of an Ordinary Man Who Has Committed Murder Shown in a Kalem Two-Part Feature.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

YOU and I, Mr. Picture Fan, are more important in this world than heroes or villains. At least we think so and we are more interested in ourselves than in people who are different. The thing that makes this offering "An Unseen Terror," noticeable among all the melodramas—it is not strictly a melodrama, but drama—is that it shows us how you or I will probably feel if we commit murder. It does not make us interested in the murder as an act in itself. Although the highest art would probably not have shown this at all, but suggested it, for when one gets down to the truth, a murder is a brutal thing to see, yet the picture's appeal is not to the elemental part of us, but to the human. Not the weight of a hair is put on the scales of Justice to prejudice us in favor of the man who commits the crime. We are interested in him as soon as he comes into the scope of the picture, but only as the person sitting opposite to us in a car, for instance. Yet if we saw that man commit a deed of violence, we would single him out from all the rest of the world and give him, for the time, a good deal of attention. It is just so here where our interest in the man is natural and unhampered by the author who has not tried to make us agree with him in anything, so far as the man's emotion is concerned.

We do not think that the picture in all it shows is wholly convincing nor that it is wonderful or exceptional work of art; for, though it is a good strong picture in its showing of a central theme, it has one or two places that are not quite satisfying. We do say that the author, in refusing to criticise his subject, especially in refusing to pity him, has done us a service and obeyed a primary rule of art. Of course, the man is shown as having a wife and family; but some pictures try to make that an excuse for crime. This man was earning enough to live on. He wanted a little extra money in order to make a fortune, so he hit his victim on the head and from that moment became an ordinary human being in an abnormal relationship with others of his kind The secret of the picture's interest lies most in the universal commonness of that abnormal relationship. Murder is a terrible crime and furnishes this in a most intense way, but does not every kind of sin furnish it in some measure? The author, by choosing a theme that is in its nature a universal one and by his treatment of it in a natural and sane way, puts himself in line with the greatest artists.

The plot construction shows experience. A picture plot is different from other plots and this, with one or two weaknesses that we will point out later, is well knit, it being clear and fairly forcible, carrying us along and showing us very little that is not necessary to our understanding of its intention. It is not a simple situation that it presents and develops, but a complicated weaving of two stories together. This is a very good layout to start with. One of these is a love story of a criminologist and the other is the story of the criminal who proves a theory by his action after a crime, and then the scientist wins the girl. The two stories are not equal partners, the criminal's being tremendously strong, made up of truth and quite human, except at the end, whereas the love story is melodramatic and has the picture's weak spots to carry. Both are fairly interesting and the fact that one is less so doesn't hamper the picture as an offering to the public. But we cannot help thinking that without more cause than the picture shows it was not the strongest method to have proof of the criminologist's theory even seem to be necessary to his winning the girl.

The presence of this theory opened the way to two faults. The first is that the criminologist is made to sit in one window for months, an improbable thing, unless his own or a friend's good name were at stake. He refused to call on the girl one evening. Did he not see her sometimes before he finally got his man? And would he have refused to marry her, if his man had been killed by a train in the lumber yard where he worked in a far-off city? The other fault, due to the theory, is that it makes the author get the criminal out of the way quickly after he is discovered; it leads to his being pictured as succumbing right there, though punishment by the law is what he really would have got. His having suffered would not have counted. To put it in a nut shell, the theory gets in the way of the real interest at one or two points.

The first character to be introduced is the criminologist, played by Tom Moore. Mr. Moore acts most roles well, but in this case he lacked the scientific gravity needed to make the character real, except in the love scenes. His elderly father (Henry Hallem) comes into the room and finds him studying a couple of rough characters sent in by the authorities (not realistic, but plausable) and shows irritation. The object is to convince the spectator that between father and son there is some incompatability and this, in order to show that in spite of it, they are good friends Next Tom calls on his sweetheart (Alice Joyce), who makes a very desirable prize which the hero may win or lose. Her acting adds much to her charm. She also dislikes his profession and feels neglected. Another character is now introduced (Harry Maillarde) who is in love with Alice and jealous of Tom This man is merely a figure, which plays the unpleasant role of part-villain. He conveniently does yeoman service in carrying on the love story and furnishes a scene of danger to the hero lest he persuade the girl that the hero is not worthy of her love. It is an ungrateful part and is played satisfactorily.

Some film is used in heightening our interest in Tom's queer profession, by the expedient of presenting some peculiar characters who, in themselves, excite out interest. Then the picture's real criminal is brought in. We see him as a clerk and the thing that impresses us in him is his dreams of easy money. His home is just what one would expect—pleasant and cheery—and he has a nice wife and a promising child. But the itch for money is there most convincingly. The work of the actor (James B. Ross), who takes this portrayal, is admirable all through. His playing is filled with imagination and when his first attempt to get rich by speculation fails and he has knocked his victim—Tom's father—on the head to steal enough for another attempt, he never permits us to forget that there is an unseen terror in him. The awful finger that none sees but himself is always pointing at him. It drives him to a distant city and finally drives him mad. He was mad in a way when he committed the deed, a few cells in his brain had gone wrong and he was covetous but at length he goes really mad and returns to the scene of the murder, where he is seen by the scientist lying in wait for him, and captured. His actions at the tree cannot be criticized, since he was crazy and beyond all rules. But would it not have been more effective to have shown him merely as standing there shuddering? The spectator's mind would have had less to do and would have been freer to feel emotion over it. As it is we see him doing the deed again in pantomime and have to wonder whether it is natural.

Reliance a Million Dollar Company

Harry E. Aitken, Backed by New York and Chicago Bankers, Takes Over Carlton Laboratories.

INCORPORATION papers are ready for filing in a new company, to be known as the Reliance Motion Picture Company, with a capital stock of $1,000,000, to produce great dramas by great authors for the Mutual Film Corporation of New York, at a cost of from $25,000 up. Harry E. Aitken, president of the Mutual, is the organizer and head of the new concern, and his associates are prominent New York and Chicago bankers. This organization will take over the immense new studios of the Carlton Motion Picture Laboratories, one of which has just been completed on the estate of the late Clara Morris in Yonkers. Another, recently purchased, is the great Kinemacolor studio in Los Angeles, and the third is a big four-story loft building at 29 Union Square, corner of Sixteenth Street and Broadway.

All of these will be under the immediate direction of D. W. Griffith. Among the big things to be done at once are a tremendous production of "The Clansman," by Thomas Dixon; "The Escape," a eugenic drama by Paul Armstrong, and other great features by Thomas Nelson Page, Ambassador to Italy; John Kendrick Bangs, George Pattullo, E. Phillips Oppenheim, Mary Roberts Rinehart, Robert H. Davis, Homer Croy and Paul West.

To get the actual atmosphere of the stories, the pictures will be taken in the original locale, new studios being opened next month in London and the South of France. So as to have the productions historically and scientifically correct the leading experts, including the foremost professors of the prominent colleges of the world, will be engaged as critics. This great feature service, organized to assist the Mutual in supplying the greatest motion picture features ever produced, will keep abreast of the actual happenings of the day just like a daily newspaper, and photograph the greatest events of the time as they occur with the actual celebrities who participate in them.

President Aitken, when asked if the new organization would make any changes in the present schedule of single and double releases of the Reliance Company said it would not, although perhaps occasionally a double-reel might be substituted for a single. The chief object of the increased capitalization, he said, was to go after the really big stuff.

KLEINE PROSECUTING "QUO VADIS?" INFRINGER.

Paul De Outo was served by the United States Marshall, after being trailed by detectives, while leaving his office in Chicago, December 17th, in connection with the suit filed November 28th by George Kleine in the United States District Court alleging infringement of copyright. De Outo operated what was known as the "Quo Vadis Film Company" of Chicago, although the company did not appear to have been incorporated under the laws of the State of Illinois De Outo marketed a picture called "Quo Vadis?" in three reels.

Mr. Kleine wishes to warn exhibitors that a series of suits is pending in the United States District Court against infringements of lithographs, heralds, etc. Many exhibitors have been unknowingly guilty of violations of the copyright law. While Mr. Kleine does not desire to punish anyone, he feels it necessary to vigorously prosecute these infringements in the interests of the exhibitor as well as his own.

THIS TROUBLE PICTURE WAS TOO STRONG.

There is a moral for script writers and producers in a short story recently printed in the metropolitan journals. It told how a widow, Mrs. Kelsey, of Harrison, N. J., in a picture theater saw portrayed on the screen a series of domestic troubles that exactly paralleled her own. It must have been one of the "misery" pictures. A woman is bereft of her husband, she has a quarrel with her daughter, and her son is placed in a sanitarium. When Mrs. Kelsey returned from the theater she told a neighbor what she had seen and how it had depressed her. When the neighbor called upon Mrs. Kelsey later in the evening she discovered the woman dead. She had turned on the gas.

The Message of the Sun-Dial

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

A VISUALIZED romance of great beauty, one that stamps Director Ridgeley as an artist born as well as trained. In this day of mighty pretense and meager performance, I do not hesitate to adjudge him an artist and one of the best kind, dominated by ideas rather than by theatricalism, imagination being his master trait. With a well-chosen and well-balanced company at his disposal, and with photodramas that suit his purposes, he visualizes not only the story he has to tell, but he creates that important element of success—beauty—by his method of narration, by exquisite choice of the story's environment.

Scene from "The Message of the Sun Dial" (Edison).

Mabel Trunelle is another important factor. But for the fact that I know of her personal relations, I might justly call her his sister artist, so delicately does she interpret her roles in dramas of his selection. In this especial case her part is not a striking one, but she gives it high value by her subtle charm of performance. She achieves a sex conception that is clean and sweet to the eye, and to her intelligence as a woman must be ascribed a delightful harmony with the pictures in which she appears. She is an integral part of the composition because she grasps the salient characteristics of her role and intensifies its import.

The story in this case is one of those which open up lives that have been lived that we may be reminded of how closely dramatic episodes in those lives resemble, and even affect, events of to-day under similar circumstances, like some of the strange confessions found in ancestral letters taken from a resting-place where they have long lain undisturbed, especially those which warn us against following blind impulse.

An impulsive young girl is engaged to a naval officer, and there is no triangle, no villain or villainess, no dropped letter, no revolver, no automobile. Nothing intervenes between two loving hearts until a slight misunderstanding grows in volume to an open quarrel and separation. The fault lies with the impulsive young beauty, and she is secretly aware of it, but her spirit is high, and she sends the young officer away for good, bidding him never return. He goes, and the director uses this opportunity to carry us aboard some genuine war vessels, dreadnaughts and torpedo boat destroyers.

In the midst of her after regrets she accidentally removes the top of an old sun-dial on the lawn and discovers a diary that has lain hidden there for more than a half century. A few words in the diary, as shown on the screen, serve as subtitles, and a situation similar to that in the modern story is shown to have arisen at the outbreak of hostilities between the North and the South. An impulsive girl, living on the same, fine old estate, drove the man she loved from her presence because of a trivial misunderstanding, with consequences so tragic as to give Miss Trunelle her opportunity in their portrayal.

The message of the sun-dial deeply affects the girl of to-day, and she sends an old darkey servant on an adventurous errand to bring back the young officer, with consequences more in accord with the natural desire of their hearts. The united stories are of the romantic that is ever reappearing, bringing beauty and charm out of the ashes of the past, possibly a finer expression of the truth than rampant realism and much more in accord with the tastes of a story-loving public

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

WISCONSIN ORGANIZED AT LAST.

The Oshkosh Convention of the M. P. E. L. of America, Results in a Real Organization in That State.

By James S. McQuade.

THE convention held at Oshkosh, December 16th and 17th, was one of the most harmonious and delightful it has been my good fortune to attend thus far. There was a spirit of good fellowship and brotherhood on all sides that was distinctly felt by every visitor. As a representative of THE WORLD, I was made to feel that I was also included as one of the band of good fellows, and I take this opportunity to show my appreciation of the sincere cordiality and hospitality extended me.

The committee on arrangements, the members of which included John R. Ek, Arthur E. Gray, N. J. Hughes, H. E. Hogan and Charles Portier, were instant in season and out of season to extend a courteous welcome to every visitor and to entertain them royally. Our friend, Arthur E. Gray, is a whole host in himself, and while the convention lasted he availed himself of little sleep in order to uphold the good name of Oshkosh. Mr. Athearn, proprietor of the Hotel Athearn, is a prince of good fellows, and all the visitors were entertained, not only as guests, but as personal friends. I cannot remember being better accommodated in any other city, large or small, as well as in Oshkosh, at the Hotel Athearn. Mr. Athearn even put himself to considerable inconvenience by assigning the green room, a spacious private dining-room, as a meeting-place for the convention.

The various speeches made by President Neff during the convention proceedings appealed to all present, not only because of their appropriateness, but for the conciliatory spirit manifested towards all exhibitors—the bolters and their adherents included. There was not a single word of bitterness for anyone and no names were brought up for rebuke or excoriation. The pronounced contrast between President Neff's policy and that pursued by the officials and executive body of the International Moving Picture Association at the meeting in the La Salle Hotel, Thursday afternoon, December 18th, was really remarkable.

The following telegram from Carl Laemmle was received while the convention was in session, and read by President Neff:

"Extend to assembled exhibitors and my many Oshkosh friends my cordial greetings, and to exhibitors, especially, my sincerest good wishes for the success and future welfare of their organization." The reading of the telegram was greeted with cheers and applause.

The following pictures were projected in the lobby of the Hotel Athearn, Tuesday evening, December 16th: "Across the Continent" (Pilot), "The Fall of Constantinople" (Gaumont), "Zu-Zu" (Keystone), and "His First Case" (American). On the evening of December 17th, "A Bargain with Satan" (Apex), was specially shown at the Rex Theater, owned by Arthur E. Gray.

Following are the names of members who served on the various committees:

Constitution and By-laws—H. H. Burford, N. J. Houze, Harvey Hansen and John Herzinger.

Grievance Committee—D. P. Long, A. M. Beglinger, Neil Duffy, Henry Goldman, John Karl and Mrs. P. J. Droske.

Legislative Committee—H. A. Gray, O. Larson, W. S. Smith and F. W. Keller.

Membership Committee—J. W. Clark, John Olson, F. T. McCarthy and H. C. Zander.

T. F. Wesley, special organizer for President Neff, deserves much praise for his effective work in Wisconsin. Securing seventy-two members in three weeks' time marks an efficient and tireless worker.

Manufacturers, Supply Houses, etc., Represented.

Manufacturers' supplies and film interests were represented as follows: Nicholas Power Co., Bert Bohannon; Wilboken Mfg. Co. (Veriscope machine), George A. Knaak; Bartola Mfg. & Sales Co. BOLTERS CONFER.

Officials and Executive Body of the I. M. P. A. Meet in Chicago—Seek to Return to the Fold.

By James S. McQuade.

A meeting of the officials and executive body of the International Motion Picture Association was held in the La Salle Hotel, Chicago, December 18th and 19th. The opening session was convened Thursday, at 2:30 P. M. This meeting was chiefly devoted to gross villification of M. A. Neff, president of the M. P. E. L. of America, and to slanderous abuse of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

The leaders in these vicious onslaughts were an obscure attorney by the name of Phillips, from Milwaukee, an erratic Socialist, called Herrington, from Pittsburgh. Samuel H. Trigger, of New York, also assisted in the attacks on the parties named; with the difference that Sam, with a show of good fellowship, arose at one time during the meeting, and advised that speakers "should not pound the trade papers too hard."

After stating that the chief business of the afternoon meeting was to hear reports from the various states in which the International Motion Picture Association operates, and that the main object of the various sessions was to devise ways and means to bring about a reconciliation between the I. M. P. A. and M. P. E. L. of America, I charitably consign my notes of the proceedings to the waste-basket and oblivion. I will, however, mention that the obscure attorney from Milwaukee addressed to me personally his vituperative remarks concerning THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, with an insolence and viciousness that caused them to fail in their object.

At 5:00 o'clock the meeting was adjourned until Friday, December 19th, at 11:00 A. M., the session lasting until 3:00 P. M., when the following resolution was passed:

That a committee of five be appointed to devise ways and means of consolidating all the exhibitors of the country in one national organization, and to report back to the board of directors of the International Motion Picture Association.

The members of the committee are: Samuel H. Trigger, New York; William J. Sweeney, Chicago; Thomas Furniss, Duluth; B. K. Fischer, Milwaukee, and F. J. Herrington, Pittsburgh.

The next meeting of the officials and executive body of the International Association will be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on the first Tuesday in March.

The Dutch lunch given in the ballroom of the Hotel La Salle, at 10:30 P. M., Thursday, was a magnificent affair, fully in keeping with the high spirit and liberality of Chicago exhibitors. The attendance represented all branches of the film business, including manufacturers, exchange men and local exhibitors. Speeches, vocal numbers, vaudeville acts and dancing held the guests until an early hour.

There were present: Charles Phillips, national president, Milwaukee; Harold Rosenthal, national secretary, New York; the members of the executive body, including Thomas Furniss, Duluth; Samuel H. Trigger, New York; F. J. Herrington, Pittsburgh; William J. Sweeney, Chicago, and Joseph Friedman, Buffalo; Nathan Wolf, Sam Katz, R. O. Proctor and L. Zahler, all of Chicago; H. Trinz, S. Trinz, S. R. Pylet, J. H. Sullivan, J. W. Tufts, Frank Bruemmer, B. K. Fischer and James Cochrane, all of Milwaukee; Mr. Miller, Buffalo, and Henry Polk, Pittsburgh, Pa.

F. J. Rembusch, Shelbyville, Ind., did not arrive in time for the Thursday session. Dr. R. H. Rhodes, national treasurer, Indianapolis, wrote that he was detained at home by a life or death case.

CINEMA CLUB STILL INDEPENDENT.

Bronx Exhibitors Do Not Favor Joining the Trigger Association—To Give Ball January 14.

Many overtures have been made by the representatives of the New York Exhibitors' Association, of which Sam Trigger is president, to induce the members of the Cinema Club of the Bronx to affiliate with the first-named organization, but up to the present writing nothing of a definite nature has been done. When Mr. Trigger and his associates first proposed amalgamation, their suggestions were summarily rejected. Trigger then attempted to form a branch of his organization in the Bronx, but when the time for his meeting happened no one was present that sympathized with his efforts, and those who did attend advised him to go back to Manhattan.

Having failed in these attempts to secure the support of the Cinema Club members, Mr. Trigger induced "Chief" Wallace, of the License Bureau, to act as "ambassador extraordinary" to the Cinema Club in a renewed effort to bring about the desired union. A meeting was called for Friday, December 26th, at which Mr. Trigger, of the New York Association; Mr. Ascher, of the New York Exhibitors' League, and "Chief" Wallace were to be present and to tell the members of the Cinema Club what was the right course to pursue. But when the time for the meeting arrived it was learned that Mr. Trigger had gone to Chicago to attend a "Dutch Lunch" given by the Chicago Exhibitors' Association. Consequently, nothing was done at that time.

No further meetings have been scheduled for the consideration of the question, but it is quite likely that further negotiations will be held, as it is reported that one of the purposes of getting together is to have all exhibitors of Greater New York unite on a plan to retain the services of "Chief" Wallace as attorney when Mayor Mitchell appoints his successor. At present this position is filled by Attorney Gus Rogers.

The business that is of the most interest to members of the Cinema Club just now is their forthcoming ball, which is to take place at Hunt's Point Palace, Southern Boulevard and 163rd Street, on the evening of January 14th. A fine reception and entertainment will precede the dancing. King Baggot and Edith Storey have promised to lead the grand march. Tickets for this event are for sale at the various picture theaters owned by Cinema Club members throughout the Bronx, but it is announced that there will be no crowding at the ball, and that all will have room to enjoy an evening's dancing.

MADDOX RESIGNS FROM OHIO CENSOR BOARD.

John A. Maddox, chairman of the Ohio State Board of Censors since its organization several months ago, has resigned. It is intimated that H. A. Vestal, the other exhibitor on the board, will follow the example set by Mr. Maddox.

PANKHURST MOTION PICTURES.

Shown at Loew's Circle Theater with Speeches by Suffrage Leaders an Added Attraction.

Two suffragette leaders, Miss Rose Windslow and Miss Helen Todd, carried the fight for woman suffrage into the motion picture theaters Friday afternoon, December 19th, when they appeared at 2 and 4 o'clock to speak at Marcus Loew's Circle Theater, where the suffrage picture "What 80,000,000 Women Want," with Mrs. Pankhurst in the leading role, was shown. This picture, taken October 23rd at the Chelsea Studios on West 31st Street, was shown Friday for the first time in public, and may go over the entire Marcus Loew circuit, whereby it would reach 1,000,000 people. The suffragettes plan to have speakers for the "cause" at every theater where the picture is shown, to speak to the audience after each showing of the film.

The picture, in four reels, takes an hour in showing. The theater was crowded when the picture was on and the audience listened attentively to the remarks of the speakers.

Jesse L. Lasky in Pictures

Well-Known Vaudeville Man, Who Heads New Producing Organization, Talks Interestingly of His Plans.

By George Blaisdell.

THERE is a newcomer in the field of motion pictures. He is more than a man with ideas, for the simple reason that these ideas are sound ones—bound to be so because they are based upon contact and most intimate contact with the larger amusement-loving public. Greetings to Jesse L. Lasky!

Just a word as to the personal history of Mr. Lasky. He was born in San Francisco, Cal.; how many years ago we are not informed, but a score and a half would not seem to be a bad guess. His first visit to the East was at the age of seventeen years, when he undertook the management of Herrmann the Great, as the well-known magician was known to the public. In this capacity Mr. Lasky traveled around the world. On his return to New York he noted the popular affection for good vaudeville, the rise of which was just beginning. He determined to take a chance on something big for the vaudeville stage. He won out. And in most of the enterprises in which he has since engaged he has landed heavily on the right side of the ledger. He received one stiff jolt, which set him back considerably more than half a million dollars, but he met the blow with a jaw as stiff as the wallop and paid every last cent. He knew the venture was an artistic success, anyway. Among his big winning acts may be mentioned "The Love Waltz of the Waldorf," "The Country Club," "The Pianofiends," "The Red Heads," and "The Trained Nurses."

In his office in the Longacre Theater Building the other day Mr. Lasky told how it happens that he is now making pictures. It seems that some time ago a proposition was made to the vaudeville man to lend his name to a projected picture-producing organization. Mr. Lasky did not agree, but his interest was aroused. He began going to picture houses. He visited those using the various services, paying particular attention to features. "I realized at once," said Mr. Lasky, "what an opportunity there was for a producer of experience, particularly one accustomed to catering to types of vaudeville audiences and the great public. Further study convinced me that the future of the business will be absolutely in the production of large features. So I came to the conclusion that, rather than lend my name to a company, I would form one of my own. It was agreed that in the beginning it would be necessary to get a number of well-known plays, as there is a marked demand for these at present. Cecil B. De Mille, who is associated with me, immediately took up the producing end of the business and started quietly to secure control of well-known, successful plays."

Screen Plays by Authors of Standing.

It was at this point that Mr. Lasky made a statement that will have deep interest for all who have made a study of the supply of picture material and especially of those who realize that a great play will not necessarily make a great picture. "It is not our intention," went on Mr. Lasky, "always to use famous plays. Eventually we will have stories by authors of recognized standing and written especially for the screen."

Asked as to the type of plays he favored for screen presentation Mr. Lasky said: "Melodramatic, with great action and plenty of heart interest. Will we have a scenario department? Yes, indeed; and it will be in charge of a well-known author who understands the technique of the camera. We are not ready just yet to tell you who he is."

"Will you organize a regular stock company of players?" Mr. Lasky was asked.

"No," he replied. "We will engage special casts for each play, and for a star a man or woman as the story may require. For instance, in the making of 'The Squaw Man,' Dustin Farnum will be the star. In the company which went west with Mr. De Mille are a half dozen principals. Oscar C. Apfel, who is well-known in picturedom through his connections with Edison, Reliance and Pathe, will have charge of the technical end. By the way, as a matter of possible interest, when Edwin Milton Royle wrote 'The Squaw Man' he had in mind two Indians he had known. Into the play he put their prototypes. We have just learned that Mr. De Mille has secured these two fine specimens of redmen for the screen production."

"Is it your intention to erect a studio?" we asked.

"No," replied Mr. Lasky, "we have adopted the motto 'The World Is Our Studio.' As an earnest of that, we are sending the present company to Southern California and Wyoming for the atmosphere of the story. We will not hesitate to go wherever the best interests of any production require. If necessary, we will send companies abroad. We intend to erect outdoor stages in different parts of the country."

There Will Be First Nights for Pictures, Too.

"Will you base any of your subjects on well-known novels?" we asked Mr. Lasky.

"We surely will," was the ready response. "We are having several put into scenario form now. But that question brings me right back to where we were a few minutes ago. Personally my policy is to produce original plays. In time to come I believe there will be regular first nights for great pictures written by famous authors. Why should there not be?"

When it was suggested to Mr. Lasky that some successful stage productions fell short on the screen and that in pictures long casts made difficult a prompt absorption of the spirit of a story, he readily agreed and cited instances in his own observation. "We are not taking any play, no matter how well known, unless we feel sure it will make a good picture. We intend to scrutinize very carefully for screen value. I believe that a famous play that draws business and does not make good retards the progress of the picture."

Mr. Lasky smiled when he was asked if he now noted any reluctance on the part of great players to appear in pictures. "No, I do not," he said. "You know how it was in the early days in vaudeville—just as it has been in pictures. The more talented players shied at the thought of such a thing. The picture business has advanced so rapidly there are none now who are not glad to come in. Have the pictures injured vaudeville? Why, I don't think vaudeville is on the decline, although pictures have caused it to change somewhat. I think though, the time is coming when the large vaudeville houses will add feature pictures to their programs. That time will be advanced by the filming of original stories. One reason for that is, we can do novel and unusual things on the screen that are impossible on the stage, and anything that is original has an appeal for a vaudeville audience. Do I think those who follow the best vaudeville and those who seek for the best pictures are far apart? I certainly do not."

Mr. Lasky has enjoyed unusual opportunities for studying the effect of the motion picture on the speaking stage. With this fact in mind, the writer asked the vaudeville man his impressions on the related future of the two factors in the amusement world. "Why," was the quick response, "the picture will bring the public in closer touch with the theater. There is no doubt it has wielded a tremendous influence on the amusement business generally and has caused and will continue to cause revolutionary changes. Eventually conditions will settle down and the drama will go on as before; and this will be the case with vaudeville. I believe, though, that the time is coming when the picture will be of the greater importance. There is a very definite reason for that statement. You can do on the screen so much more than you can on the stage."

It is expected "The Squaw Man" will be ready for release about February 15. It is intended to release one subject a month. Mr. Lasky's interests in the picture field will in no way interfere with his activities in vaudeville. He has, he says, good organizations in charge of each. Besides Mr. De Mille, Mr. Lasky will have associated with him in his picture enterprise, which will be guided from his present offices in the Longacre Theater Building, Samuel Goldfish and Edward Milton Royle. Mr. Goldfish has severed all former business relations to devote his entire time to the financial management of the new concern. Mr. Royle is the well-known playwright.

Mr. Lasky smiled as he showed the writer Mr. Royle's letter accepting his proposition for an alliance. It is interesting from many points of view, not the least of which is its plain revelation of the fine type of mental calibre of this acquisition to the rapidly expanding screen army. While there will be many who will feel that Mr. Royle has arrived at some conclusions just a bit late in the day, there will be cynics who will chucklingly affirm that he has watched the development of Kinematography from its inception. As an exposition of the workings of the mind of the old-line dramatist, the final recognition that What Is Is in spite of inrooted disbelief, the document is a psychological marvel. It is a drama—a struggle—in itself. We have the introduction, the development, the climax, the decline, and the catastrophe—i.e., the rehabilitation, the turning over, the happy ending. Read it for yourself:

The Wickiup, Darien, Conn.

My dear Mr. Lasky:

I have decided to accept your liberal offer, and perhaps I owe you an explanation of my delay. Ever since the first ingenious man conceived the idea of embalming actual plays in moving pictures I have been honored with propositions for "The Squaw Man," but I confess I could not take this movie-madness seriously. Its very popularity seemed to be against it. Whole communities, you know, used to be afflicted with the smallpox. Every emotion in the raw, every situation since the fall of man, was being grabbed with coarse, unskillful and sometimes thievish hands and smeared pell mell into pictures. It was all so crude and formative. Speaking of the fall of man, I didn't know we had such audiences, "pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw," demanding so little and getting so little. I saw all the expedients, all the machinery, all the saw-dust of drama which the dramatist spends years of study and toil to forget, dumped into the moving picture hopper with a steam shovel, and the horrible result apparently enjoyed.

If the moving picture is to stop here it is evident that it is a childish toy or a futile fad. It will duplicate the history of the bicycle, once a craze, now an article of commerce. But I see signs that the kindergarten stage is passing or is passed. You have helped me to a new view. The moving picture is fast developing a new art form, a real art form, with a new distinct place, and a future whose end no man can see. For this new hope we need men. You are at the gate, just as I am. I believe you are entering this world of alluring possibilities at a very critical and perhaps the psychological moment. If you are to become an apostle of the new art you must have more than an ambition to make money. I am putting "The Squaw Man" into your hands with the understanding that you will do fine and beautiful things in a fine and beautiful way. The day when the public will swarm to the picture show just because it's cheap or just because it is a picture show is over, but the day of moving picture art is just begun. There will be a demand for men of taste, of discrimination, of ideals, of imagination. Here is a more elastic and plastic medium in some respects than is the written and spoken drama. Here is something of the freedom of form of the novel with the actuality and compelling power of that which is seen instead of described.

Those of us who love the theater and have devoted our lives to it, at first resented the moving picture, resented its rude crowding of its elder sister into the background. To tell the truth, we are for the time being bewildered and anxious. It is inevitable that we of the theater must readjust ourselves to the changed conditions and the new order. There was a time when the theater was the average person's principal, if not his only, form of amusement. That was a happy day for the actor, the dramatist and the manager. That day is gone; gone probably never to return.

The theater will always exist, but it will have to turn its attention to the higher forms of art, where the rewards are not essentially commercial, and where recognition is slow and grudging. It will be the home for the drama of wit, of subtle characterization, of profound and complex emotions, but these will illustrate the philosophic dictum, "the higher, the fewer." In the process of elimination there will be inevitable readjustment for many actors, managers and authors. There will be fewer theaters. Those of us who are not adjustable will have to fade away. It is a very strange and a very interesting epoch. Let us hope that our venture gives it a boost instead of a knock.

EDWARD MILTON ROYLE.

EDWIN AUGUST.

Writes, Directs and Plays Leads in Powers Dramas—Tabloid Interviews on His Work.

"THERE are no friends like the old friends after all," declares this screen matinee idol, who insists on remaining a shining star in the Universal firmament. And Edwin August practices what he believes. Many a man in his position might swell to the bursting point and become aloof to the common herd. But not August. He's a good fellow, simple in tastes and true always.

Edwin August.

"I honestly believe that success is the most severe test to man's character and capabilities," he said to me one afternoon. "Give many people praise, allow them to imagine they are the big fish in the pond and real ambition that urges hard study and constant endeavor to inprove is lost."

Versatility such as possessed by Mr. August is found in few men and it has earned him a just reward. But Edwin August is always the same. He has a large diversity of characters. From the ranch cowboy to the humble divine is but a short step for him as he is a past master in the art of "Making Up."

"Pantomimic ability is largely what counts," says he, "in determining the success of a screen character. Unlike the stage, there is absolutely no chance to accentuate the part by the use of dialect or inflections of the voice.

"Yes, I have played a great many roles, written a great many photoplays and directed scores. I am very fond of the psychological drama, as there is every chance in the world to the alert student to do fine shading, to point pointed morals. Yet I fear the romantic, the costume play appeals to me the greatest."

"Into the Lion's Pit," a play that has just been produced and acted by Mr. August, is a play of this nature.

The Fall of France.

An Instructive Historical Apex Subject in Three Parts.

The principal fault to be found in this very good picture lies in the title of it. It should have been named "The Rise of Germany," or "The Union of Germany," or something of that sort, to make it appeal to German-Americans. Its present title will never appeal to French-Americans, and the picture itself, taken from the German point of view, will be barren of Patriotic inspiration to a Frenchman. The French element in America, however, is vastly outnumbered by the German which no doubt would patronize the picture heavily if it had the direct appeal to it in the title. Still, it may be that to all patriotic Germans. "The Fall of France" and "The Rise of Germany" are synonymous. Let us hope so.

There have been many, many invocations for authentic historical subjects without the extraneous love story that is usually dragged in by the hair to supply the so-called demand for "heart interest." To almost every manufacturer and producer on earth, it seems suicidal to stage an incident of history exactly according to the facts and without the young hero and the "goil." The producer of "The Fall of France" has entirely disregarded the unwritten law of heart interest and has turned out a straight, historical picture that can easily hold its own with any perverted historical subject that has ever been shoved down the throats of a long-suffering public.

Scene from "The Fall of France" (Apex).

It is a stern picture of men and their measures. No woman appears in it except in the most incidental way. The dignity of the army is so well sustained that the interest carries through to the very end and it is safe to say that women will admire it as well as the men.

The action begins with the withdrawal of the French ambassador from Prussia. This is followed by the declaration of war against the latter kingdom by Napoleon III, Emperor of the French, in 1870, using the succession to the Spanish throne as a pretext. Bismarck, by making public the flippant demands of the French, aroused the people of the German states to a call to arms. These scenes are well described in the picture, showing the mobilization of the troops in the streets of Berlin, and the house-to-house canvass for men.

Major Kayserberg is then seen leading his men away to the battle of Saarbruick, in which contest he lost his life. In rapid succession follow the battles of Missenborg, Wörth, St. Privet, and Sedan. These are fine battle scenes, and, with the proper kind of music, they can be worked up to the point of frenzy. The defense of Wörth by the Algerian troops is one of the best hand-to-hand street conflicts that could possibly be done. Succeeding events lead on to the negotiations for surrender, the meeting of William I and Louis Phillipe at Bellvedere and the final coronation of William at Versailles as Emperor of united Germany.

The photography is good and clear; the glimpses of Berlin are refreshing; the field scenes are well chosen and acted with a dash that leaves nothing to be desired. The characterizations of Wilhelm I, Louis Phillipe, Bismarck and Von Moltke are true to the impressions that have been left by those men, both in resemblance and dignity. On the whole, it is a decidedly interesting picture and very well done.

OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

AT A RECENT convention of clergymen held in Nashville, Tenn., one of the delegates declared that "moving picture shows of to-day are dark holes of vice and shame." A few days ago Hudson Maxim, the famous inventor, declared, through one of the leading newspapers, that moving pictures have done more towards helping temperance work than any other individual or combined effort in the cause. He stated that he knew of one place where the number of saloons had been reduced over forty per cent., and the saloonmen driven out of business attributed it to the moving picture houses. Mr. Maxim backs his declaration with facts.

During the holiday season many department and other stores were victimized by people without authority ordering goods to be sent to well-known motion picture players C. O. D. During the week immediately preceding Christmas some of the players had an average of four packages a day offered to them by delivery messengers. It is said that several of the victimized firms are endeavoring to trace the parties who placed the orders. The only conclusion thus far reached as to the object of the imposters is that the orders were placed by practical jokers. If such was the case their efforts were misdirected if the results were to score against the players, as investigation shows that all the unauthorized deliveries were refused. It is hoped the miscreants will be located and punished for the uncalled-for trouble and labor they put upon the working forces of the stores during the busiest season of the year. Some of the picture players were greatly annoyed until they made known their positions to the stores. They felt that their credit might be affected by the repeated refusal of deliveries. In keeping with the white slave hysteria wave, it has been intimated that men who placed orders while parading under the names of players did so for the purpose of forming acquaintance with the saleswomen; and it has been suggested that each one who received orders be closely questioned as to recent acquaintances they have made.

At the complimentary dinner given by the Friars to David Warfield a few nights ago, many of the addresses made by managers and others interested in the old line of theaters contained hints that apply with equal force to all concerned in the photoplay business. During the discourses an effort was made to determine the cause for the great falling off in box office receipts at the high-priced theaters throughout the country. It is said that the drop has been as high as sixty per cent. None of the speakers would admit that the photoplay was in legitimate competition with their interests. Every ingenuity of speech was resorted to so that the photoplay might be referred to as infrequently as possible, and then only to refer to it in deprecatory terms. In his comments on the dinner, Mr. Louis V. De Foe, dramatic critic for the Sunday World, quotes William A. Brady, the theatrical manager, as writing: "So, in considering the decent theater, the public is wholly responsible. Its tastes seem to grow lower and lower every year. Some time ago it was said that the moving pictures would make more theatergoers. So they have, but they have made theatergoers who demand sensation and smut."

Previous to making this declaration, Mr. Brady is credited with having written in the same contribution as follows: "The first-class theater business is suffering from too many theaters and too few good plays . . . the play writers of the world have not turned out one really big play this year."

Now, what conclusion is to be drawn from Mr. Brady's sentiments? On one hand, he claims that the patronage lost by the "decent" theaters, with the additional number of theatergoers that have been created, went to the motion picture theaters because of a desire for sensation and smut. On the other hand, he lays the loss to an overplus of theaters, and inferior plays. The latter declaration is nearer the mark, but the causes assigned are, by no means, alone accountable for the drop in business at the old line houses. If Mr. Brady intends to convey the impression that the picture houses have created patronage for the old line houses that have been producing sensation and smut, the contention is as groundless as it is original. The picture theaters have not been clearing houses for the others. They have held and steadily increased their popularity to such good effect that instead of driving patrons to the old theaters they have forced those houses out of business one by one, and they are dropping out day by day.

It is to Mr. De Foe's own remarks that the attention of the photoplay people is particularly drawn. It is a keynote for producer, rental agent and exhibitor, alike. Mr. De Foe says theatrical people are disposed to disregard or resent lay advice in matters pertaining to their profession. They do not seem to heed the fact that the salvation of the theaters rests on the public's good will. Here we have in a nutshell the solution which Mr. Brady seemed to be unable to reach.

Years ago the old line theatrical managers saw the possibilities of the motion picture as a competitor. By ridicule, prejudice, unfounded criticism and malicious maneuvers, the pictures were handicapped in the battle for recognition until, by persistent and conscientious effort, they at last got fair and impartial consideration and won the public's good will. It is upon that foundation that the great popularity of the photoplay stands.

It is now up to the people interested in the photoplay field to weigh carefully all the circumstances attending the demoralized condition of the old line theaters. The declarations and admissions now made by the managers of the latter should be memorized and the pitfalls carefully avoided. They must not be led astray by the declaration that the popularity attained has been due to a desire for the sensation and smut reflected by the pictures, or believe that the majority of theatergoers want that kind of stuff. The fact that certain pictures the police of this city stopped a few days ago drew large audiences is no indication of what the amusement public wants. To get the good will of the public it must be given that which the patrons feel free to recommend to their home circles and friends. Plays to the contrary may exist for a while and make big money, but their life is a short one and their existence incites a spirit of resentment that eventually reacts against the whole system.

And the photoplay people must not rely solely upon the elimination of smutty and unduly sensational matter from their productions for a continuance of the popularity they now enjoy. While scores of the old line theaters are closing to re-open as picture houses there is in the horizon a well-defined and healthy-looking "come back" rising. It would be the height of folly for any one to assume that the photoplays will put the regular theaters out of existence altogether. There will be a readjustment of the old line theaters in time, and strong bids will be made for the business that has been lost, so the photoplay interests must not rest upon their oars. The present standard must be sustained, and improved wherever possible, so that when the "come back" arrives there will be no occasion for an exodus of the patrons because the photoplay has "gone back." This means hard, unremitting and expensive work, coupled with the ever-present danger of the undermining of public confidence by the influences of interloping makers and exhibitors of films—people who hope to make big profits on indifferent and cheap productions on the strength of the good will the legitimate makers and exhibitors have established with the amusement public. It is hoped that before the new year closes somebody will come forward with a regulation on the order of the pure food law for the prevention of adulteration of photoplays. It is badly needed. A gentleman sitting in a theater a few nights ago after a play had been run on the screen remarked to a friend at his side: "That is criminal. Don't you think a commission should be appointed to examine into the sanity of the people who wrote and produced that thing?"

SPECIAL DIRECTORS FOR THANHOUSER "BIG FILMS."

Special directors have been signed by C. J. Hite to help in the making of Thanhouser "Big Productions." Carroll Fleming, the famous New York Hippodrome producer, is one. Most of the great recent spectacles at the Hippodrome were the creations of the ingenuous Fleming and it is for spectacle scenes that Mr. Hite has wisely secured his services. Howell Hansel is the other new "Big Productions" producer. He comes from a twenty years' experience in the legitimate, where he staged numerous "big cast" plays, entitling him in Mr. Hite's opinion to an immediate chance at "Big Production" film producing. Eugene Moore, the veteran of the regular Thanhouser directing staff, has been on the feature stuff of late. Marguerite Snow and James Cruze have joined Maude Fealy as stars in the features. Clarence Dull has been appointed property master on the big stuff while Michael Schliesser, as announced recently, is wild animal manager. Many of the feature scripts call for lions, tigers and other beasts of the jungle, and Schliesser, who was with Hagenbeck in Germany, will find himself a busy man. One of these scripts is "The Fall of Khartoum," which calls for elephants and camels in addition to other animals. The new all-glass stage put up exclusively for the "big sets" in the features is half a city block in depth.

Lotteries Again.

HERE'S one aspect of the lottery matter that managers, and particularly those who print house programs and distribute them through the post office, will do well to consider. Under the constitution each State is sovereign and can rule its citizens on all matters pertaining to the State, but it has no jurisdiction in interstate matters, since this would be infringing the sovereignty of other States, and the Federal government. To use an illustration, you have a perfect right to get drunk in your own home if no one objects, but if you go on the street, any policeman may arrest you. So long as you remain in your own home, you cannot be arrested save on complaint sworn out by some member of your family. It is the same in your State. As long as you stay in your own State, you are answerable only to that State, but if you go into some other State you must answer to that State just as Jim Smith can have you arrested for getting drunk in his house instead of your own, or a policeman can arrest you for being on the street in an intoxicated condition. Your State and other States are the various homes, but for interstate matters, the relation is the same as the policeman who controls the public thoroughfares.

You may have a premium scheme or some other trade getting device that is perfectly legal in your State. Suppose that you have a comedy called Cross-Eyed Charlie, and announce that you will give a free admission to every tenth cross-eyed man. You may be advised by your attorney that the scheme is legal and he may cite the highest court of the State to prove his point. You can make the announcement in front of your house, you may print the same on handbills and distribute them to every house in your territory and be wholly within the law, and yet if you advertise this scheme by circulars and mail them, your scheme, perfectly legal under the State law, now becomes an offense against the Federal laws, and you are liable to prosecution for distributing through the mails matter advertising a lottery, because the wording of the Federal law construes as a lottery any method of distributing awards of benefits, the apportioning of which is in the slightest way dependent upon the element of chance.

The Lottery Definition.

A lottery in the common acceptance of the term is some prize distribution in which tickets are bought and the prizes awarded by drawing numbers from a wheel or in some similar fashion, but under the Federal law a lottery is anything decided by chance to the profit of preferred persons. In the cross-eyed scheme the prize goes to every third cross-eyed man seeking to purchase a ticket. If all cross-eyed men were admitted free, without any further restriction, the element of chance would be removed, but unless all persons are treated precisely alike, the element of chance is held to be present and the line is drawn with exceeding stringency. The scheme you propose may be legal in your State, but the post office is an interstate, or national matter, and in using the mails you become subject to the Federal law, and the circular that may be delivered to a house by your own employee with perfect legality, renders you a lawbreaker if you employ the United States Government to deliver precisely the same circular through the mails.

Also the Newspapers.

More than this, if you advertise the scheme in the newspapers, all of which are circularized in part through the mails, you are held to be responsible with the paper in question for seeking to advertise a lottery and even a mention in the paper of your scheme, though not in any sense an advertisement of that scheme, renders the paper liable to the Federal Government. We have seen any number of weekly programs with some "lucky number" feature, and others that announce some distribution. Every one of those is unmailable. You may circulate a hundred schemes and not get caught and be made to suffer the hundred and first time. The use of a sealed envelope does not save you. The fact that the letter is sealed does not alter the fact that you are breaking the law, and you cannot tell when some competitor will lay an information against you.

If your scheme is legal within your State, circularize by hand if you want to, but do not mail out any announcement of a contest, competition or prize distribution in which the element of chance enters to the slightest degree.

This is not saying that lotteries are safe chances so long as the mail is not used to advertise it, but it is warning you that what may be legal in your State is not legal in the eyes of the Federal Government, and it is better to read it here than to find it out through a personal interview with some post office inspector.

Pictures and Plays.

The other day we had a note from the manager of a house playing pictures and road attractions according to the bookings of the latter. He commented on the fact that his employers did not yet realize the growing importance of the pictures as a factor of theatricals. This is the case in many houses we know of, but we note that Klaw and Erlanger, who book these road attractions are more keenly alive to the value of pictures as money-makers. All of the theatrical men are turning to pictures when there is an opening, and if a theatrical man is not in pictures now it is merely because he has not yet succeeded in finding an opening.

Used the Seals.

The Olympian Theater, Seattle, used the Red Cross Christmas Seals on all tickets sold for two recent Monday performances. Next year we would like to see a Red Cross Seal Day when on an appointed day every theater in the country stamped each admission with a seal. Think of the income it would bring those who are fighting to stamp out the modern plague! There is a whole year for the organized exhibitors to talk it over in. We like the simple tone of the Olympian's announcement, which runs:

> On behalf of all, a Red Cross seal will accompany each full ticket next Monday and the Monday following. Thus we can all help a little the great work of fighting tuberculosis undertaken by the Red Cross Society.

A Daily Educational.

The Roseville Scenario, a Newark theater in the Roseville section, gets out an attractive weekly program. It carries a lot of type, but it is well written and the display is particularly good. Only the second page is given to the current program, the third page advertising coming features and the music and sound effects. The first page is given to general announcements and on the back page a sort of business directory replaces the usual business cards, an alphabetical order being observed and thirteen announcements being given. This scheme will sometimes work where the more ambitious advertising campaigns fail and since no chance of copy is required, the typewriting cost is kept down. This will give an idea of how the scheme is worked:

> BAKERY GOODS. A. Dona & Co., 545 Orange Street. Tel. Branch Brook 1360.
> BUTTER, EGGS, ETC. Orange Butter and Egg Market, 565 Orange Street. Tel. Branch Brook 3627.
> COAL AND MASON MATERIAL. H. B. Salmon Company, 357 Grafton Avenue. Tel. Branch Brook 663.

One of the front page announcements states that at least one educational picture will be shown each day, and in keeping with this is another announcement to the effect that "no vaudeville or other claptrap" will be given. Cheap vaudeville does not appeal to those who would be attracted by the educational films, and of the two those interested in educational subjects are far more apt to prove the better clientele.

We do not think much of "scenario" as the name for a picture house, but we most assuredly like their policy.

Wants To Know.

The Academy of Music is thinking over the multiple reel—just as others are but being a man of action, the manager puts it up to his public. This clipping from the Academian is worth reading and thinking over:

> Again we ask your preference on a matter of house policy under the patent argument that it is to our advantage to give you just what you want, when you will tell us that you do want it. This time it is the matter of multiple reel pictures. We have placed a coupon on this page which we ask, beg if necessary, that you fill out.
> At the present time our regular service gives us three two-reel features each week, to which is added a Famous Players production in three or more reels now and then. But the General Film Co. are releasing enough multiples to give us one for each day in the week, if we are sufficiently anxious for them—or, to be perfectly frank, willing to pay for them. If you—or a sufficient number of the aggregate you—want a feature a day, be assured that all you need do is say so. Giving you what you want in so far as we can find out those wants is our one reason for being here.
> Some people object to the longer film because of the lost interest when one does not happen to see the beginning of the play. As it has been pointed out, it is very hard to become interested in the first reel of a picture after you have seen the climax of that story; and especially so in the case of two-reel subjects, one or two other stories come between the end and the beginning. And we might as well admit it, some times the stories made into two reels are a bit short for that length, or, as the saying is, "padded." On the other hand, the producers are turning out their most important pictures in the longer films. But as we have remarked, the house is run for your pleasure and if you want a feature a day, you'll get it. Though you must understand that it may be two, or even four weeks before the change can be made. But that's something for us, not you, to worry over after you have had your say.
> But, please, for our benefit and for your own, sign the coupon.

It is welcome news that the Edison Company is going to keep on with one reels. Too many of the manufacturers have neglected the one reel for the multiple—and they are not doing well with the multiple, at that.

Slides.

Evidently the Moneta Theater, Cleveland, Tenn., does not believe in advertising slides. It broke its rule to run the Red Cross Seal slide, but it takes the trouble to offer an explanation to the patrons in its house program. This is the announcement:

> We have been asked by the National Red Cross Association to run a Red Cross slide to advertise Red Cross seals for Christmas; this we have agreed to do free of charge. We believe this a worthy cause and we are willing to help them this much at least.
> We are sure none of our patrons will object as it is for the benefit of every one.

This little explanatory paragraph argues the desire of the management to keep faith with the audience even in small things, and it is the right attitude. Make your people feel that you want to do only what is best, that you guard their interests to the point where any seeming departure is made.

The house also announces a voting contest for the Ladies' World popular hero contest. It is also the first we have seen this year to use the free Christmas matinee for the children idea. It may cut down the profits for the day, but it makes friends for a whole year. There is something in going to the theater free that is not to be computed by admission prices.

The house uses a sixteen-page program on good book paper, with many cuts, and the Christmas cover in two colors. One point wherein it fails is a lack of display. A single size and style of type is used for all reading matter, set mostly in upper and lower case and a lack of display type gives too white an appearance that is not redeemed by the lavish use of cuts. The title of a two-reel feature is set precisely the same as is the cast that follows and differs only from the body of the paragraph in that it occupies a line by itself. A judicious use of some full-face type would vastly improve the appearance of the pages and at the same time enhance the advertising value by playing up the important lines.

In the same way a number of well-written appeals to patrons are partly lost because they follow the descriptions of a subject with neither a cut off dash nor a special head. These little intimate paragraphs are distinctly good, but they would do ten times more service if they were run in full face or even a monotone instead of the shaded letter. With such excellent press work, it seems a pity that the display has not been more carefully considered.

They offer something new to us when they state that they are the only house in town running "union-made" film. We have heard the Patents Company called a trust, but never heard that they were the union.

Plain Talk.

Recently the Academian, Selma, Alabama, talks straight from the shoulder when it wants to, and it wanted to talk about its business lately, so it ran this editorial:

> With the first issue of this paper, and a couple of times afterwards, we have requested, even begged for, suggestions for improving the program at this house, arguing that you, better than we, know the kind of pictures and the kind of music you like. Not a word has been said. Now, that might be taken as meaning that everything pleases everybody, but when no more than eight per cent. of our gross population happens around each day, we KNOW differently.
> Right now it stands this way. We have gotten the best operator we know and have given him the latest equipment on the market, and with it all he is getting as good results as we have seen anywhere. That for projection. And we have four musicians under a capable leader who can and do play together and to the picture shown. And each day the General Film Company ships us four reels of pictures, themselves selected from the entire output handled by them, from which we select the three shown here each day. The house is comfortable and well heated; yet only eight per cent. of the people here come in each day. In all seriousness we ask the other ninety-two per cent., "What Do YOU Want?"

There is nothing braggart about this, but if you lived in Selma and didn't go to the pictures, wouldn't this make you feel that the Academy of Music was worth looking into on picture nights? That was what the management was aiming at and it made a bullseye.

Got the Bacon.

Here is a letter from William P. Warmamaker, of the Lyric Theater, St. Matthews, S. C. We thought that the General Film had suppressed the bacon stuff. It is a very short-sighted policy to keep this going when they are in the film business and not supposed to be in the advertising business, but this is what was written:

> It has happened to me! I read about several instances of it in the Moving Picture World, but thought it surely would not be sprung down here. Imagine my feelings while running my first show last night to a packed house, and right in the middle of a very pleasing little comedy where good things to eat played a considerable part, to read on a sub-title, "How we make them"; I immediately "shut down" on it and hurriedly wrote on a slide, "We find that this is an 'advertising' film, and hate to finish it, but as this is the last reel, will do so this time"—and another, "We promise that this will NOT occur again." The crowd took it fairly well, but I sure was mad! I wrote the exchange about it, and tore them up for sending it. I asked them what in hell they thought my screen was—a Billboard? The film was made by Pathe and entitled "The Family Jar." It's quite some "Jar," too, believe me, to the exhibitor. It is to boost "a packing company's" products. I am talking "right out in meeting," and would like to see this letter published, with the names, etc., just as I've given them. I feel very strongly about this matter and have no desire that my name be withheld.

If Chester Beecroft could stop writing about "Bill" long enough to pen an assurance that no more advertising films would be foisted on subscribers and if that promise was kept, no matter what any company paid the General Film or any constituent company, it would do more than the "Bait" editorial ads to make and hold business. No exhibitor wants to sting his patrons, now does he want to be stung himself.

Enlarged.

The Gem Theater, Pittsburgh, Pa., comes out with an enlarged program, evidently from the same press as the late Cameraphone bulletins. It carries almost as much outside advertising as some of the locality papers (more inches than many), but with twelve pages it can care for what it has without detriment to its own announcements. The brief program is carried on the front page and a page a day given inside to each day. It is a very creditable sheet from any angle.

Exclusive.

The Colonial Theater, Fairmont, W. Va., has a four-page program and uses all four pages for its own announcements. The allotment of space is rather peculiar. There is no mention of Monday or Tuesday; one-half of the second and third pages is given to Wednesday and Thursday, respectively, and Friday and Saturday share the fourth page. A better arrangement would be to give a half of an inside page to each day and keep the back page for announcements and chat. Boxing in each title gives the page a choppy appearance and makes it confusing to read. Boxes throw the titles into prominence, but an excess of boxing is bad. Here each of the two reels is given a box and the title boxed within a box. The day is also boxed, giving five boxes for each day. This costs extra to set as a rule and a better effect could be gained through the use of slightly heavier type. Apparently the house does not favor very bold type, but it is not necessary to smear ink all over the page. An outline letter can be used with almost equal effect.

An orderly arrangement of the display will improve the pulling power and the appearance of the sheet at the same time.

A Two Page Paper.

The Martz, Tipton, Ind., is getting out a two-page paper, a single sheet, 8½ by 12, printed on both sides. Much stress is laid on the music, a change in the orchestra pit having been lately made and only a single subject, Protea, is given specific advertising, possibly because the program is not known in advance. It is chatty in tone, but a little talk about pictures in general would help not a little. No one particularly cares to read two pages of house argument with not a line of general matter to carry the interest along. More of the type would be read if there was run some general matter relating to the players. Give them something they want to read and they'll read what you want them to as well, but straight argument, no matter how good, tires.

Whose Is It?

Now and then something is apt to get lost around a newspaper office, and the latest thing to turn up missing is the photograph from which this cut of the Globe Theater, of somewhere, was made. If the data is supplied, we will be glad to give credit for the clever advertising showing. One thing we like about the plan is that an excess use is not made of the flag. Overworking the flag is apt to be antagonistic to the best effect.

Doing Things Right.

H. M. Starr, of the New Empire Theater, Detroit, is the first to report on the Red Cross Seal story for this year. Last year Mr. Starr made an unusually good showing with his newspaper work for Hope, but it was not a marker to this year. The showing of the film marked the opening of the Christmas campaign of the local society, and all of the papers advertised the fact that the campaign would be opened by the showing of the subject at the New Empire. This carried a two-column cut of the seal and a reader. Most of them repeated with a "follow" story and one of them used a two-column story with cuts of two of the young women who sold the seals in front of the house and in the theater during the intermissions, more than $50 worth of stamps being sold during the day. Every story, of course, carried the announcement of the house and the connection of the house with a charitable work of such widespread interest is the most beneficial that a house can get. It stamps not alone that house but the photoplay theater in general, as a factor for public good and does much to offset the occasional attack.

Mr. Starr has been doing a little educational work on his own account, and the word "movie" is not to be found in any of the newspaper reports.

Nine newspaper advance items, most of them at least half a column long, is the sum total of the newspaper campaign and a next day story tells that the theater was crowded all day long.

The Mutual Stuff.

Philip K. Mindil, a "regular" press agent, is in charge of the Mutual Press Bureau. Working with dramatic attractions, Mr. Mindil has even invaded the white house, and more than once. He is getting out a press sheet that is being used by the daily papers and we think that it would be an immense help to the Mutual man with a weekly program and we think that Mr. Mindil will be glad to put program publishers on his list if they will apply. And if your local paper does not get the sheet and you have no program of your own, see that the paper gets on the list. The stuff is newspaper, not press stuff, and will do you good. "Newspaper stuff" is the stuff that newspapers can use. "Press stuff" is the sort a chap writes when he has to please the boss. They seem to be letting Mr. Mindil use his own good judgment.

Bettered.

The Spotlight, the program of the Fichtenberg Enterprises, New Orleans, is out with a colored cover. It looks more like a "regular" than ever.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

American Wants.

NOTE this from the American Film Company, and note also the Chicago address:

We want scenarios that will tax the versatility of America's foremost moving picture stars and that will continue the desire to want to "See Americans First," the slogan of the best American made "movies." Dramas and comedies in any length, from 500 feet to 8,000 feet. Stories that will hold the interest with a not too obvious ending, but with sudden, unexpected changes in the trend of the story. Mail direct to Scenario Dept., Santa Barbara, Cal. Highest prices paid for available subjects. General offices, American Film Mfg. Co., 6227-35 Broadway, Chicago.

In Sending To Edison.

The photoplay writing game seems to be particularly rich in the sort of idiot who cherishes the idea that a script personally directed is more favorably read than one addressed to a company. It may be when you know the person addressed well enough to call him by his first name if the aforesaid person is in a position to purchase scripts. This is the only exception to the rule.

Lately it was announced that Acton Davies, of the Evening Sun, would read all Edison scripts before production for dramatic values. It was not announced that he had been made script editor or that he would act in other than an advisory capacity, but ever since the item was printed, the studio has been deluged by scripts addressed to Mr. Davies, who is not at all interested in any script until it has been accepted through the regular channels. Address your scripts to the Edison studio and not to Mr. Davies, Mr. Plimpton, "M. O'K.," any director, actor, scene shifter, property man or office boy. Address them simply to Thomas A. Edison, Inc., 2826 Decatur Avenue, Bedford Park, New York City.

Surely this should be plain enough.

The Oakland Inquesters.

Here is a breezy report from the new Oakland Circle of the Inquest Club. New members should address E. A. Kelley, 2810 Derby Street, Berkeley, California.

Last evening was the second meeting of a lively and instructive Inquest Club, of Oakland, Alameda and Berkeley. A theater was attended, after which we repaired to a home of a member and a lively denouncing of plays seen, criticisms and suggestions on a play soon to be submitted, and various points in photoplay writing were given by members.

Only seven out of a very possible twelve were present. We have three "live ones," with several releases each.

If there is any prize for a cheap organizing of an Inquest Club, I want to compete. A few letters and postals did the work, totaling possibly about 23 cents, possibly a good going number.

Mr. Cole Burke, moving across the bay, wished me to take up his work. He gave me a few names, and, with the assistance of The Oakland Tribune, several more were secured.

Perhaps the Moving Picture World will lend a hand to enlist some more. If so, the favor will be highly appreciated.

I have no objections to being addressed direct and believe it would yield more likely response.

The most forcibly discouraging element that crops out at Inquest meetings is the small price that some companies, not the really smallest or financially wrecked, have paid for some classical plays already produced. Now, with the best public majority disgusted at photoplays, and even the local papers beginning to make fun of them and of their studio-written rot, it would seem that film companies, in making prices, should use more professional ethics and not so much of that business "grabbin habit"; that price makers should either not have such long hours or late suppers, or, take more pills.

The Cines Contest.

We are advised by George Kleine that there will be a slight delay in communicating the exact terms of the Cines script contest. If you have written in for details, please be patient.

And in connection with the contest we can supply the address of a translator into French for those who cannot comply with the requirement that the scripts be in either French or Italian. If you want the address, send a stamped and addressed envelope, please.

Western Studios.

When Marc Edmund Jones moved on to Los Angeles we asked him to give us his ideas of the various studios. Here is his first impression and he will take the others up in regular order. He is familiar with studio equipments and his comments on the Los Angeles studios will be a real help to those who wish to know just what they can do.

Don't get the wrong idea from Mr. Dayton's statement that nothing is impossible. Nothing is impossible to them IF they want to do it, but they are not going to want to do the unusual story involving extraordinary expense, unless they are well assured that there will be a positive return in additional sales of prints here and abroad.

Mr. Jones' next article will deal with the Vitagraph and Kalem studios at Santa Monica.

The Western Universal Studios are located at Hollywood, a part of the City of Los Angeles, and about a half hour's street-car ride West from the central district of the city. Universal City, or "The Ranch," as it is generally called, is some distance back in the hills, and is only reached by a regular automobile service maintained by the Universal for the use of those at the ranch on company business —in other words: no visitors. The ranch provides a large percentage of the exterior locations for the companies, and there are stages at both the ranch and the Hollywood studios. The dressing-rooms, offices, etc., are all at Hollywood, and scripts purchased for the companies are handled theme. The mail address is 6100 Sunset Boulevard, Los Angeles, Cal.

The scenario department is headed by James Dayton, an experienced writer averaging over 150 produced scripts a year, and who has been with the company since the establishment of the Pacific Coast branch. He carries the title of Editor, but does not read scripts, or have anything to do with them until ordered purchased by the director, in which case the voucher must be approved by him. He is virtually a general director of production in his duties, and it might be said that the Western Universal has no editor. A script coming in is read by a reader reporting to Dayton, and unless it is plainly impossible, it is put into either the "comedy" or the "drama" pigeon-hole, there to be read by the different directors. A director, reading the script, will order it returned or held, and if he likes it will order it purchased when he is ready to put it on. If approved by Dayton, the check is mailed and production started. Payment is made upon the start of production and no scripts are purchased ahead for any of the directors. The director is practically his own editor, and a sale depends entirely upon striking the fancy of one of the directors looking over the script. If a story is good, the expense, character of the story, size of the cast, and other details have little bearing on the sale. The Universal has learned that a story necessitating an expensive production will bring back more than the added expense in extra copies sold abroad. Please note, however, that the word "necessitating" is used, not "requiring." Quoting Mr. Dayton, "We can handle any kind of a story whatsoever—no limitations of any kind!"

This article will appear in print from four to six weeks after writing. At the time of writing there are twelve directors working, with some seventy capable players in regular stock, and the character of the work being done by each director is as follows: Changes may occur in the line-up, but the reader who follows the news items in The World will find that he is kept pretty well advised. Incidently, this is not an invitation to mail scripts to the directors or to write to them. Deal with Mr. Dayton only."

The Smalleys and Edwin August write their own scripts. Allen Dwan puts on high-class psychological drama and melodrama featuring Pauline Bush. Francis Ford is making Bison-101 multiples. Harry MacRae is doing likewise, and can also handle animal stories. Otis Turner is making straight melodrama. J. F. McDonald is producing Warren Kerrigan. Alfred E. Christie and Donald McDonald are making high-class comedy, and Allan Curtis is making Joker Brand slap-stick featuring Max Ascher. Wallace Reid is making one-reel Nestors featuring himself, and Robert Leonard makes either drama or high-class comedy for the Rex brand.

Mrs. Breuil Lands.

Mrs. Beta Breuil has been coaxed to reconsider her decision not to take a routine position again and has accepted the artistic management of the North American Films Corporation, a new concern with plenty of money back of it and an ambitious program for the future. She is not editor, nor is she production manager. Her undeniable talent is not limited in any particular line, but she is the artistic advisor of the corporation, bringing to her work the valuable knowledge gained through her previous connections, but here her genius for devising effects and working out ideas will have an absolutely unlimited scope, for she will have no one between herself and the heads of the company.

Mrs. Carr, a wonderfully clever writer, until lately with the Vitagraph, has been engaged to assist Mrs. Breuil, as has Miss Marie Jacobs, a comparative newcomer, but one who has shown some excellent scripts. Miss McCall has also been engaged as title editor.

Mrs. Breuil outgrew her editorial position. The new engagement offers her ample room for the development of he unique ideas. The fact that she has made so excellent a connection will be appreciated by the many friends her courtesies to authors have made her.

More Contentment.

Here is another letter from a contented woman that may help others, and like all other successful ones she is bothered by the pest who seems to feel that a favor is conferred when information is asked for.

The Photoplaywright columns are the first things I look at when I receive my World. Some of the various comments I mentally agree with—others I do not, but one to-day just appealed to me—"A Lesson in Contentment." I would like to know that busy mother, for I am another and her experience seems like mine in many ways.

I have sold a few more than she, my work has gone mostly to the licensed companies and I have not written as many. But I am like her in so far as contentment goes. I have always received the best of treatment and often the rejections have helped me more than the acceptances. I have never happened to lose a script and my courage is always good, though when they return again and again, I know there's a reason. Sometimes I find it—sometimes I don't, then I lay them aside and long after when I see them again, a new line of thought presents itself and lo! the whole thing is changed.

I have not written all summer, but am starting in again, full of enthusiasm. Have sent off my first "two-reel," two short comedies, have others in the process of "simmering" and countless plots in my head and notebook to be developed. I try to have every one the very best I am capable of doing for I know that if I am doubtful, surely others that know more than I will be more so.

Truly, there is much to learn and it is useless for one to try unless they like it and are willing to work—have unlimited patience, courage and a goodly amount of everyday common sense.

I was amused at her experiences with "would-bes." I can appreciate that for mine have been many and varied. Absolute strangers will come to me and not apparently think that it amounts to anything to ask for one's time and assistance. I am more than glad to lend a hand, but there are so many that are impossible, that at times, it is trying, to say the least. If you don't take pains with them, they say you are "jealous" and want it all. If you try hard to help some friend and they do not sell the very first script the first time out, they are discouraged and throw it up, thinking that you did not tell them correctly!

One woman, in particular—a perfect stranger, came to me and smilingly introduced herself and announced that she had heard of me, etc., and she wanted some "information" on the subject. She knew nothing of writing and less of pictures and their requirements, yet she thought she'd like to try it!

Dodging Inserts.

In a recent production a leader flashes, stating that one of the characters is called back to town. Then the scene comes and we see him receive and read the lettergram without the telegram being flashed on the scene. A member of the Inquest Club wanted to know why the telegram was not shown and was told that the nature of the business that called the character home had no bearing on the story and, therefore, the leader saved time and expense of preparing and photographing the telegram.

If you need to show why a return to town is necessary, the chances are that it may be more quickly told in a briefly-worded telegram than in a leader, but if the leader will convey the idea as clearly and with greater brevity, by all means use the leader. It is not possible to establish any hard and fast rule, since each script presents its own problems. To steal a line from Carl Laemmle: "Use the brains God gave you."

Make the right sort of a noise, but do not make too loud a noise or in time you'll get hoarse shouting and be able to make no noise at all.

Some of these days the manufacturers will realize that a better price will bring a better and more careful grade of work. Already the prices are going upward. Mr. Curwood has refused an offer of $125 per reel from another company. If you'll do the very best that is in you—not merely the good enough, you'll presently find yourself possessed of a reputation that will bring you better prices whether or not you can write fiction. Don't wait for the hundred dollar price to come. Write hundred dollar stuff to prove you can write it and then kick for the hundred. Someone will give it to you.

Returning Checks.

A correspondent wants to know our ideas on the subject of returning a check to a manufacturer if the sum offered is too small. Here is his position:

> A short time ago I sent a two-reel scenario to one of the companies; they replied, advising the story could be used if I would accept $40.00 for it and that they would have to revamp it. When it was released I was fortunate in being able to see the production, and it followed the scenario very closely, there being but a very few minor details that were changed, showing it was not necessary to revamp it.
> A couple of weeks ago I sent a three-reel story to the same company; they came back with the same reply, offering $60.00. That story has not yet been released, but I am rather anxious to know if they did find it necessary to revamp it.
> Would you consider it policy to return their check and take a chance on placing it elsewhere, and would it not seem if one editor would accept it, that you should stand a reasonable chance somewhere else and perhaps at a better price?

He adds that being a new writer he hesitates to return a check for fear he will not make a sale elsewhere.

On general principles a story offered "at usual rates," is offered at whatever the company is willing to pay and the check should be accepted, no matter what it's figures, unless it is ridiculously small. At the same time, if the payment is not what the author considers to be adequate, it is perfectly proper to inquire if the check represents the average of that company. A letter something like this would be good form:

> Gumph Film Company,
> New York City.
> Dear sirs:—
> I return herewith signed release for "Kissed by a Cow." May I ask if $40 is your usual scale of payment for two-reel stories? I should like to do business with you, but $20 a reel for two-reel stuff is scarcely a profitable proposition, even where studio revision is necessary as in this case.
> Very truly,

This will open the discussion and if the studio wants your work and it really is worth more than the price paid they probably will raise the ante. If it really is worth no more to them the editor will explain why—if he is the right sort of editor. In either case no harm can be done by a courteous inquiry. A stamped and self-addressed envelope should, of course, accompany the inquiry.

Where a check is absurdly small it is customary for the editor to explain why and leave it to the author whether or not he will accept or reject the check. If payment is made at the rate of $10 to $15 a reel, the author is entirely within his rights to refuse the payment, but it is better to take it and then kick.

As to possible sales elsewhere, that is something for the author to deal with personally. Acceptance by one company argues some good in the story, though it may be that merely some single flash of merit has caught the editorial eye and this will not be perceived elsewhere, in which case no other sale is possible, but as a rule the story that will sell to one editor can be sold to some other editor.

In the matter of revision the author is not able to judge from the screened production just how much work has been done on the script. In film it may look precisely like this plot of action and yet it is quite possible that the entire story has had to be written to get the action on paper as it was in the author's mind. He may think he has it all down and yet an editor may have to work half a day to get a good working script from the author's vague copy. On the screen it looks like the story the author thinks he wrote, but not at all the story he did write. At the same time this "revision" thing is being overworked in some studios where the editor is trying to show the boss how much he can save, so too much credence should not be given that statement.

The best plan to follow is this: Try out your market. Find out the markets that suit you best and that you best suit. You may write just the sort of stuff the Gumph is willing to pay top price for and yet that may be the very stuff that the Gowoggle Company holds in contempt and will pay the least for if it takes it at all. Take what it offered, make polite inquiry when you think it is not enough and in the course of time, without having gotten in bad standing with any company you will have found the companies where you can market to the best advantage. Then you'll be in a position to market intelligently by submitting first to those that offer you, personally, the best opening. You may get $25 a reel from the Gumph and $10 from the Gowoggle. Your confrere may find the conditions reversed and sell to better advantage to the Gowoggle and curse the Gumph for short payments. It is all a matter of experiment and experience.

Comedy.

It cannot be said too often that the present demand for comedy is almost wholly "rough stuff"; not slapstick stuff, as some editors have stated, but rather a broad farce or travesty. Travesty has a call, but few write good travesty and the poor travesty is poor, indeed. Make a note of that nice polite comedy against the time when the polite comedy is again in demand, but meantime rough it up, but do your roughing nicely.

Inspiration.

Its all very well to write from inspiration, but you need the spur of system to make that work. No two men have the same system, but all writers who turn out good work make a business of their writing and do not wait for the lamp of inspiration to be lighted. At first it may be well to wait for a good idea, but even from the first, aim at a certain amount of work each day or each week.

One writer we know has a rather unique system. He writes a story one day and does revision the next, not revision work on the same story, but revision on the story he wrote the week before. One week he does original work on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, doing revision the other three days. The following week he reverses. On Monday he works over the story he did the preceding Monday and on Tuesday he does an original to be worked over the week following. He always has three stories in the rough and three being polished, and he claims that with five stories intervening between the rough draft and the revise he has forgotten the exact run of action and so goes at the work with a more open mind. This will not suit all writers, but it is a good scheeme for the methodical man who turns out a lot of work.

But no matter what your system, let the essential be a certain amount of work done each week or month, and turn out that stint.

One Reel Stories.

Several writers have bewailed the fact that there is no longer any market for the one-reel story. It is not as bad as it looks. The present demand is all for two-reel stuff, but there will always be a demand for one-reel subjects and there will be a better market for the short length presently when the manufacturers get a better appreciation of the market. At present the multiple reel is all the rage, yet the fact that a two-reel subject cannot make good for a poor single-reel is beginning to be understood. Many exhibitors are complaining that they cannot do as well with the long subjects and in the cities they are finding that the transient trade cannot be held with a three or four-reel subject. These are all right where the audience is in at a stated hour, but it does not appeal to the man who drops in to spend half an hour and arrives in the middle of a four-part story. Keep on writing one-reel stories and eventually you will sell them.

Length.

From a recent letter we take the remark that the correspondent is going to get a copy of Technique in order to learn how to estimate the length of a two-reel script.

This is something that no book can teach. If you write a short story or a novel you know that it is about so many thousand words long and will fill about so many pages in consequence, but it is very different with a photoplay. Two directors employed in the same studio might take the same script and one would get 800 feet and the other 1,500. It is not a matter that may be determined exactly and most experienced writers know that some companies will make a half-reel of what another company will work into a full reel.

Length is not determined by the length of script, not by the number of scenes. It is determined solely by the number of feet of film passed through the camera at the time of taking, less the amount eliminated in the cutting room.

The only way to approximately judge is by the value of the idea and this must come through the cultivation of the judgment of the individual. If you have enough story for two reels; not enough action but enough story plot, write it in two reels. If it is not strong enough to run two thousand feet try and keep it down to one. You cannot write exactly a thousand feet or two thousand feet. You can only write about a certain amount of action and leave the rest to the director.

Length is something that must come through experience and that can come in no other way.

The Long Way.

There must be something in the early action of a play to grip the attention. The audience will not wait until the last third of the story to become interested. It is not possible in photoplay to use the fiction device of a "punch scene" and then hark back to the real beginning of the story, but it is possible to make your beginning interesting. Get them by the neck with the first three scenes, whisper a little explanation and then get the full swing of action.

Cut Loose.

Because a certain scene suggested to a writer the idea for a play she wrote the story with that scene in it, adding perhaps $50 to the production cost and giving nothing in the way of effect in return. Learn to cut loose from the actual source of inspiration if it is in the way. If the sight of a ship suggested a sailor who had settled on the Western prairies, you would not write in the ship in an Illinois farm story. Get rid of the idea that you must stick close to your start.

Giving Help.

Several writers of standing have recently commented on the fact that the persons who demand the most help from others are generally those least worthy of being helped. That's usually the way. The man who deserves success is generally the man who fights most of the battle for himself and only asks assistance when he cannot down an opponent alone. The chronic "leaner" makes no effort to help himself, but expects to be carried along by those who are forging ahead. Don't lean, hustle .

Get Yours Back.

The North American Films Corporation has several scripts without name or address. They will be returned to their owners on receipt of a stamped and addressed return envelope of proper size. No writer who omits name and address and return envelope should be entitled to receive his stuff back, but the North American wants to be nice about it. If you are one of the erring ones, send for your script—and don't do it again.

Thinking Right.

It is not enough to be able to think. It is as important that thoughts be directed into the proper channel. One photoplay student has evolved all sorts of plots, but they are not practicable because he is thinking along the wrong lines and permits his fancy to roam too far afield. Some writers think photoplays. Others merely think ideas, thinking that all ideas are photoplays. They are not. There are certain well-defined limits to follow though, and unless the ideas are held within these limits, it is better not to think at all.

Just the other day a fiction writer, a German, announced that he knew he could write many good plays, and to prove his point he originated five plots. Four of them concerned poor flower girls. Two of the girls went wrong and two stayed good, but all four were of a type not well known to America and, therefore, none of them would appeal to an American producer. His fancy was working overtime, but it was not working along the right lines. Learn to think in photoplay and you'll be less likely to write a play that starts in New York and goes to Japan by way of the Panama Canal.

How many stories do you suppose have been written around the Panama Canal?

And how many do you suppose have been bought?

And yet some people wonder that the stories are not taken when interest in the Canal is so widespread.

That's the idea. Think about the Canal, but not when you are planning photoplays.

Another Wrinkle.

A Pennsylvania correspondent has found a new wrinkle. He explains:

> I have just discovered a stunt that is new to me and it may be new to some other beginners. Before typing the finished copy of a script, I read it through, not in the order in which it is written, but in the order in which it will be photographed. If scenes 1-6-8 are in the same setting, I read them in that order, making sure that the action is so worked that the director will not have to turn to other scenes to make it out. To an old hand it may be necessary, but personally I find it very suggestive.

The only real value of this idea seems to be that it leads the author to read each scene by itself. This is very apt to show the scene in a new light, since it is read by itself and not as a part of the running story. In this way it is useful, but it is not always possible to write the scenes so that each is independent of all other scenes. It should not be necessary for the director to turn to other scenes, but there is a probability that an understanding of the whole is necessary to the understanding of any one scene. The correspondent has found the idea useful—though he credits the benefit of the wrong source—and others may also benefit. Practice should make it possible to keep each scene clean-cut without these special efforts.

Taking It Easy.

A Western correspondent has been thinking things over and here is his revised creed:

> I have worked on scenarios, and looking back, I can see, scenario by scenario, the improvement. I can now recognize a plot when I see one, which was more than I could do at first. I intend to keep on improving. I also intend never again to shell out any stuff that I don't think is honestly good, not "good for me." I think not having time to turn out any scenarios for a time has done me good too, for it has let some good ideas age, and develop, and has taken most of the haste out of my desire to shell out plays. It has made me more deliberate and careful. But I never let an idea escape, nor a title, for sometimes a title suggests a plot. I jot it down somewhere, and then transfer it to the waiting list, to be thought over, and used when I get a chance. I think I get a lot more ideas than I can write up, but when I begin to retrospect the ideas that I jotted down some time back, and find that many of them were not ideas at all. I'm going to get into this game, and I'm not going to break in—I'm going to work in, and when I get in there, I'm going to work up.

And when you have read it over you are likely to come to the conclusion that it is a pretty good way to look at the business. You cannot build a lasting success on a rush job. Don't break into the game, but like this writer, work in, and then work up.

Rejections.

Are you easy to lick?

A man just told us that he got a script back from a certain company and it spoiled his work for the day. He was doing another story, but when the rejection came he got so fussed up that he could not do the story he was working on, but could think only of the story that had come back.

It's no disgrace to have a story come back, not only once but many times. In this particular case it was a story utterly unsuited to the company to which it had been sent and its rejection was foreordained, but that didn't matter. The only thing the writer could think of was that the story had been turned back, and so he lost a chance to write another story on that account and he didn't even send the first one out somewhere else.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answer here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

E. A. K.—Will write soon. A panoram is a single scene. How do we know what was meant in the book? We didn't write it. We've explained the fact before.

R. B.—There is no "average cost" in making trick pictures. One reel under the work you mention may take a week and another three months. The price you mention would not be excessive. It would scarcely cover the cost of some work on this line. We cannot direct you to the plate device. We do not think it has been put on the market yet.

W. E. O.—A stamped and addressed envelope will bring you the address of the Kansas City Circle, but the Answers Man hates to direct envelopes.

A. D. J.—There is no complete list of photoplayers. What would we do with one if we had it? We do not recognize the title you give. We do not chat the players.

C. McD.—Send addressed envelope for the addresses or ask your own newsdealer. Name the character in the Selig, please. We know nothing of the business concern you mention.

T. W. G.—James Cooley.

V. I. H. G.—We do not know what company made the first release. Miss Pickford was with Majestic when it started, but soon left. Augustus Carney has gone to the Universal.

F. F. K.—Possibly the rejected script came in with postage due and the company was not willing to gamble two cents on a careless writer. Since you sent to Imp, and Imp is read for by Universal, it is more probable that they argued that if you didn't know that, you didn't know much about playwriting. For no other cost than a stamped and addressed envelope, you can get a list of addresses that is kept up to date. See the note at the head of this column. You will most assuredly violate a copyright if you arrange a copyrighted story. That's what they copyright them for—to keep them from being stolen.

D. D.—Wall Edwards was the Tom Hood of "Loaded Dice." We do not know the other player. A. G. Vosburg had the title role in "The Greenhorn." Miss Clara Simpson was Miss Gordon in "The Ironmaster." Massachusetts passed the law requiring the picture houses to be lighted at intervals for the same good reason that a dog chases it's tail. It didn't know any better. In the early days, when projection was poor, there was some eye-strain in watching pictures for any length of time, but that was some years ago.

A. W. I.—It looks like the usual school graft.

B. M. G.—We have not that Pathe cast. It is only very recently that their players have been cast.

E. G. H.—We do not believe that the enclosed slip would help the sale of a script. Get a reputation with the magazine first, and then you can dictate, if you have made good. When you do want to offer serial rights only, it is better to so state in a letter and not on a paster.

Technique of the Photoplay

(Second Edition)

By EPES W. SARGENT

Not a line reprinted from the first edition, but an entirely new and exhaustive treatise of the Photoplay in its every aspect, together with a dictionary of technical terms and several sample scripts.

One hundred and seventy-six pages of actual text.

Special chapters on Developing the "Punch," Condensing the Script, Writing the Synopsis, Multiple Reel Stories, Talking Pictures, Copyrights, etc.

In cloth, two dollars. Full leather, three dollars.

Question No. 13.

BEST answer will be published and names of others sending in replies of excellence will be published in the Roll of Honor.

What care should be given to a commutator, and what is the best evidence that it is in A1 condition? Explain what troubles the commutator is liable to and how you would remedy each.

Roll of Honor.

At this date, December 1st, there are only three men entitled to be included on the Roll of Honor on question No. 7.

Jack Adams, Toronto, Canada, sent in a very good reply, as did W. L. Johnston, also of Toronto, and L. C. La Grow (the name has been misspelled in other issues. It is La Grow, not La Graw), of Albany, New York. It was left, however, for John C. Collins, Pittsburgh, Pa., to set this matter forth fully and completely.

Apologies.

Through some inexcusable error Questions No. 10 and 11 are duplicates. This happened while the editor was sick, therefore, all he can do is to apologize. Very few of you knew it, but he was laid up for two weeks, and there was a good big chance of his taking that long, long trip which all of us have got to take some day; but the trip was not taken, and he is back on the job. He was in bed, however, for twelve days with the Sawbones there every day.

Reply to Question No. 7 by John C. Collins, Pittsburg, Pa.

The question:

Suppose one of the bearings of your motor or generator became sufficiently hot to pull the babbitt and it was necessary that you re-babbitt the same, what would you use, and how would you go about the job? Explain in detail the various necessary steps of the whole performance.

The Answer.

In the first place, if it were necessary to re-babbitt immediately and do a quick job I would not cool the shaft down with water, but by pouring oil over it, since water applied to a hot shaft has a tendency to raise the grain of steel, and thus roughen it. Having brought the journal to its normal temperature I would proceed as follows: First wrap a sheet of ordinary writing paper around the journal smoothly, not letting it lap at all, but "butting" the ends together, applying a little library paste, or any other handy, quick setting glue which would hold the ends to the shaft. The reason for this is that if the babbitt is poured directly on the shaft it will be much hotter than the shaft and if it be a solid bearing it will be impossible to remove the same after it has contracted through cooling, while if it be the ordinary type of split bearing (in two halves) it will still be too tight on the shaft after the babbitt has cooled. The sheet of writing paper will make it just about right. After having first cleaned out the recess in the casting thoroughly, so as to remove all oil, dirt and moisture, I would set the armature and its shaft in place, and support it in such manner that the shaft is central in the opening in the casting, and the armature itself central between the pole pieces. (This is where all the other gentlemen fell down, and it is one of the most important points of all in re-babbitting—to get the armature centered exactly between the pole pieces, because in well constructed machines there is not very much leeway, and the armature must be very carefully centered, or it will rub. Ed.) Having accomplished this I would bank the sides with clay, or stiff mud, which had been worked thoroughly, or kneaded, into a dough, being careful to have it as dry as possible and to leave vent holes at either end at the top, since if this latter is not done there is danger of the mud being forced away from the casting, thus allowing the melted metal to run out. By-the-way, I think I neglected to say that before the paper is put on the journal it, the journal, should be thoroughly cleaned. The boxing is then ready for pouring. But before going further let me say that the foregoing is modified if the boxing be in two halves. In that case the procedure is the same, except that the lower is poured first, and then a piece of paper is fixed in so that it will lie flat on the face of the lower casting and extend out over the babbitt, which has just been poured, to the edge of the journal. This paper may have considerable thickness, say a thirty-second of an inch, or, with large bearings even one-sixteenth of an inch, the object being first to prevent the melted metal of the upper boxing coming into contact with the lower half, which has just been poured, and adhering thereto; second to provide space between the upper and lower halves, so that as the bearings wear the wear can be taken up. In this case the paper will, of course, be removed after the upper boxing is poured and a metal shim substituted, which will be just thick enough to allow the boxing to be pulled down tightly without clamping the shaft. The permanent shim will not extend out to the journal, of course, but merely to the edge of the babbitt. As to the best metal, or babbitt, that is a question concerning which there is considerable difference of opinion. Good anti-friction metals contain mostly copper and tin, plus possibly a very little lead. Many of the patent metals contain too much lead, it being a cheap metal. This may be detected by drawing it across white paper. If it leaves a mark, such as a lead pencil would make, reject it. Good babbitt will leave no mark at all. Inasmuch as the brands of metals change from time to time it would be wise to ask your power house engineer what is the best brand of babbitt. It would hardly be practicable for the operator to make his own mixture. Having secured the metal I would melt the same in a suitable ladle, or a small iron kettle, being careful not to get it too hot, because melted babbitt oxidizes very rapidly and the hotter it is the more rapid is the oxidization. On the other hand, if the babbitt be not heated sufficiently it is likely to set too quickly when it comes in contact with the cold casting and journal and not form a complete bearing. The best test is to heat the babbitt until a sliver of white pine will show slight signs of charring when thrust into it for about two or three seconds. Having our metal properly heated we now pour it rapidly into the boxing through the oil hole on the top, or, if there be no oil hole on the top then through an opening left in the clay at the top, being careful to hold back the "scum" on top of the metal. The pouring must be done rapidly and you must not stop once you have started. Of course, if it be a two-half boxing the above will be modified to the extent that the lower half is poured directly into the cavity at the side of the journal and only the upper half poured through the oil hole. Having completed the job we remove the boxing, especially if it be of the solid type, just as quickly as the metal has set and before it gets cold. This is very important, since otherwise it might clamp the shaft and you would be unable to get it off at all, or at least would have great difficulty in so doing. It only takes a few seconds for the babbitt to set if the shaft and journal be cool or cold, and, I repeat, immediately this takes place remove the same from the journal. The only thing remaining is to scrape the inside of the boxing, removing all roughness, and, if it be a solid bearing, fit it so that it will just slide into the journal without too much friction. Of course, I may have overlooked some point in this matter. Moreover, the question is a difficult one to answer in this way, since there are so many different types of bearings and the details of babbitting the solid bearing of the very small motor and the split boxing of the large motor are quite different. I would suggest also that while it is a good thing for the operator to know how to re-babbitt, still all up-to-date motors and generators are fitted with ready-made boxings, which should be kept on hand, ready to slip in. I would also suggest that it would be impractical, not to say impossible, for the operator to babbitt a ring-feed self-oiler. By the way, I forgot to mention that after the scraping has been done, oil channels must be cut in the babbitt, using a diamond point chisel.

Mr. Collins is right in saying that it is no longer, except in a very few instances, necessary for the operator to babbitt a motor or generator boxing; still it is very necessary that he understand such matters, because he may have other boxings to babbitt and he might get caught in a pinch where he would have to babbitt his own motor or generator or shut down. I, therefore, asked this question to see how many had this particular piece of information.

I would also like to call the undivided attention of operators to the fact that some of the best managers in this country are watching that Roll of Honor, and those who appear any number of times upon it are very likely to be sent for. Therefore, I would humbly suggest that some of you make greater efforts to dig up the right answers. The Roll of Honor to date is disgracefully short.

Simplex Machine Makes Good.

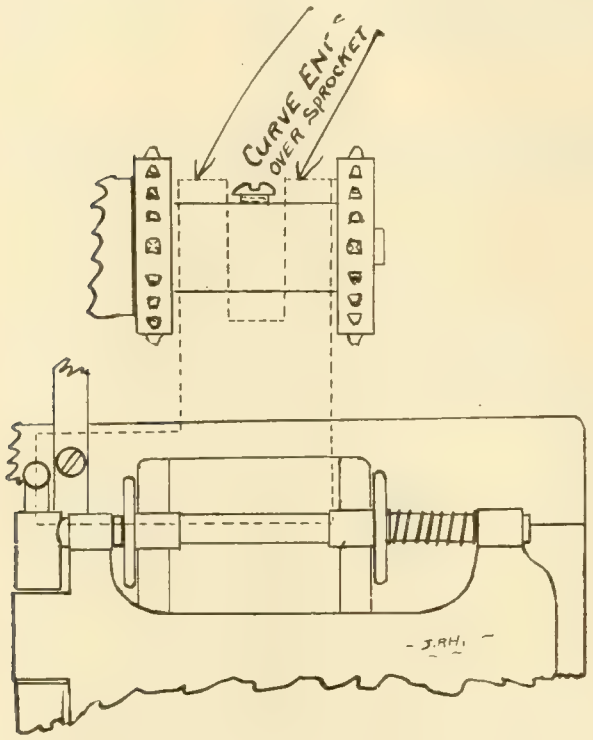
F. W. Gilbert, Yorkton, Saskatchewan, Canada, says:

> I am the operator at the Empire Theater, the seating capacity of which is 420; showing a 14-foot picture at 85 feet. Have a Simplex machine and Fort Wayne compensarc working on 60-cycle 110-volt current. I have had no trouble with the machine or the light. When I first started there was a slight blue ghost; this was eliminated by bringing the condensing lenses closer together. In the basement we have a 9 h.p. Fairbanks-Morse, single-cylinder, 4-cycle, throttling governing gasoline engine, and a 5½ k.w., d.c. generator. This we use when the city current is not good, or when it is cut off, as it is every Saturday.

Will you please tell me why you do not use that plant all the time Brother Gilbert? Can you not produce current cheaper than the city will furnish it to you? What does it cost you to generate, and what does the city charge you—a little more information, Friend Gilbert? I am interested when you mention isolated plants.

A Good Stunt.

J. Roy Hunt, Birmingham, Ala., has made an addition to his Power's Six machine, as shown by dotted lines in cut. It consists of a metal shield, attached as shown, which prevents the film from catching in the upper sprocket teeth, as sometimes occurs when a poorly made patch goes through, and pulling down between the upper sprocket and machine head.



We have some other stunts contributed by brother Hunt which will appear as soon as possible. The little shield is of undoubted value and can be installed by any operator of ordinary ingenuity. The illustration is clear enough to require no special explanation.

Stanton, Iowa, Answered.

W. K. Richards, Macomb, Illinois, encloses $5.00 for two copies of the Handbook, and says:

> Mr. J. A. Wetter, Stanton, Iowa, on page 1,006, November 29th issue, says his Power's machine has a "catch" in it. It might be possible that the shaft on the fire shutter governor has become loose—that is to say has a little end motion, so that the governor cannot set up tight enough to keep the small pinion from getting into the large driving gear. I had the same thing happen, and I think that is the seat of his trouble.

Well, Brother Richards, perhaps Friend Wetter will know what you are driving at, but I am blessed if I do. Suppose you try again, using the numbers in figures 116, 117, 118 and 121 to set forth your meaning. The part that gets me is where you say "set up tight enough to keep the small pinion from getting into the large driving gear." Exactly what do you mean by that? If you mean that gear 621, figure 118 of the Handbook can, by reason of wear, come out far enough to catch on one of the spokes of gear 630, it hardly seems possible that that could occur, but I cannot dope out any other meaning which seems at all reasonable, or even possible.

Replies by Mail.

Michigan orders a Handbook and asks for a reply to the following questions by mail:

> If you were to install a new projection outfit, what make would you buy? I am using an old Edison projector and lamp-house on a. c., with 25 amperes at the arc, using an old H. & H. Compensarc, and strange to say, I am showing a good picture when everything runs right. Would it pay me, and would it be all right to buy a new Edison head and use my old lens, and a Power's lamp-house? What is the best lens to buy or order with a projector? Do you think it would pay me to use the H. & H. reducer instead of the one the projector manufacturer sells?

Here is a gentleman who evidently does not realize that if I went into this sort of thing I would be called upon to answer probably a hundred letters every day—and could do very little else. I must again tell you if you wish replies by mail you must enclose a minimum fee of $1, though carbon copies of the department replies will be sent free of charge where a self-addressed, stamped envelope is sent. As to the make of projector I would buy, why if I were to tell you that through the department I would receive a bouquet from one manufacturer, and a brick from the rest of them. The Edison, Power's and Simplex are all good machines. The combination you propose I would not advise. If you are going to get a new Power's lamp-house, and a new Edison head, and you think the Simplex is the best, why in the name of common sense don't you buy one of the outfits complete? Both the Bausch & Lomb and the Gundlach-Manhattan lenses are good, but in the case of any make of cheap projection lenses some are better than others. If you are showing a good picture with 25 amperes a.c. and an old style, and presumably badly worn Edison projector, it is strange indeed, in fact I think you must be practicing witchcraft. As to the H. & H. reducer (economizer) I do not know anything about it, therefore could not give you any advice. If it was a very good article, however, I think its manufacturers would certainly have posted this department regarding its merits before now.

A Unique Proposition.

Messrs. Linn and Havens, Glidden, Iowa, contribute the following exceedingly interesting, though somewhat lengthy letter:

> We have a Power's Six, which has been in use a little over a year and a half. We have had no trouble with this machine to speak of, until just lately we have noticed an up and down movement of the picture—more than we think there should be. The teeth of the intermittent sprocket are worn some, though not badly. The roller on the intermittent idler seems to be slightly flattened on one side. Is it possible that this idler has been hugging the film too tight? We have never changed its adjustment. Should we get new rollers? Our throw is 71 feet, on an aluminum finished screen. The picture is clear and sharp, using a.c. Our theater is quite a novelty. It is in a store, with groceries on both sides over which we draw a curtain at night. Our seating capacity is 225. There is a stage 12 feet deep by 18 wide, with the screen at the back of the stage. We are sending photograph of the room as it looks in the daytime, also at night. (That photograph has not shown up much to my disappointment.—Ed.) Quite a few show people have said it was a combination they had never before viewed. (I guess that is right.—Ed.) It takes about thirty minutes to get the room ready for projection, drawing the curtains, putting up the folding counters, etc. . The room is 36 feet wide by 60 feet long. We have one hundred opera chairs, sixty folding chairs, and twelve long school seats. Vaudeville is used occasionally. We run three reels per night, changed daily. The town has a population of 960. Enclosed find money order for a copy of the Handbook, which please send as soon as possible. We have electric current.

Well, that is some stunt, all right. Store-room theaters are as common as fleas on canines, but this is the really real thing—a theater in a regular store, and with a seating capacity of more than 200 at that. Send us that photograph, gentlemen, we would like to see it. I would also like to call attention to the fact that by a combination of this kind Messrs. Linn and Havens are successfully operating in a town of less than 1,000 population. As to the machine trouble you should by all means get new idler rollers; evidently the roller has not been revolving. Operators should see to it that their idlers revolve, else they will in time wear flat on one side. In order to properly lubricate these rollers they must be removed from the spindle, the spindle thoroughly cleaned, and a drop or two of light oil be put on. Do not use heavy oil, particularly in cold weather. But the fact that the roller did not revolve would not cause the jumping of the picture. The up and down jumping must be caused by unevenly worn sprocket teeth, and that probably is the seat of the trouble. It could also be caused by dirt on the face of the intermittent sprocket. Examine the Power's machine instructions in the Handbook carefully. I would suggest, however, if your machine has been in use a year and a half, you should send it to the factory for overhauling. This might cost you anywhere from $20 to $30, but it would be worth it. Write to the Nicholas Power Company, 90 Gold Street, New York City, concerning this.

Thank You For "Them Words."

E. M. Roll, Sumas, Washington, says:

> I have been an operator for eleven years, but I find the projection department very interesting and must keep up with it or soon be a back number. I have an attachment on my take-up which gives the same tension throughout the run. I splice all three reels of my show together and run them all through without stopping. Will send a drawing of it in my next letter. I want to thank yourself and the department correspondents, for the good work being accomplished. I am a member of the I. A. T. S. E., and have been for six years.

We appreciate your words of commendation and trust we may continue to merit them. I will be glad indeed to have the drawing and description of that tension equalizer, at your convenience. If it is not too complicated it will be of a great deal of value to thousands of operators and managers, and, indirectly, to the business as a whole.

Information Wanted.

New York City asks the following question:

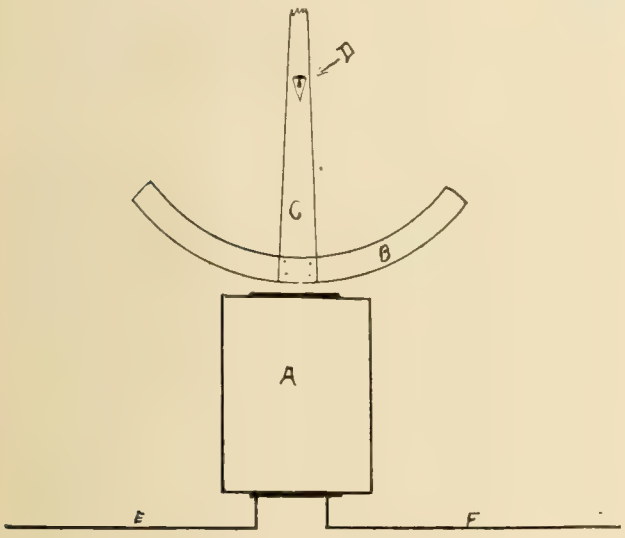
> How many amperes and volts would we get at the arc by connecting two 110-volt compensarcs (or any other economizer) in multiple, the primaries and the secondaries in series?

The writer then makes inquiry concerning an apparent discrepancy as between the Hallberg and compensarc instruction in the Handbook, relating to the relative number of turns in the primary and secondary coils. The brother is not at all clear in his query. You do not connect the "primary in multiple and the secondary in series," but merely connect the economizers in multiple, whereupon you would get the capacity of both economizers, whatever that might be, according to the make of economizer and the contact the controlling lever is on. In using this kind of a combination, however, it would be necessary that some contact be used on both economizers, and that both be of the same make and type. I am not saying it is a really practical combination. Somebody asked if two economizers could be used in multiple, and I said yes. I would not, however, advise that it be done. Now, as to the instructions—in the language of the immortal Teddy, "I refuse to be interviewed." The instructions on those different economizers were prepared by their respective manufacturers. I, of course, checked them over as closely as I could.

An Experiment.

In looking over some old electrical magazines I found, in the October, 1913, issue of "Modern Electrics," a description of a home-made "battery gauge," which it strikes me as possible to adapt to the operating room—although I am not sure as to that.

In the sketch, A is an electric magnet, which acts upon permanent magnet B, made of steel, in a curved form and suspended by means of the brass arm C from the pivot D, which should have a knife edge and be attached to a solid standard to prevent vibration. E, F are the wires with which A is wound, and any current flowing through these wires will cause the magnet to attract either the positive or negative end of permanent magnet B, according to which direction the current flows. This attraction is, of course, resisted by the weight of B, the total result being that pointer C is moved a distance proportionate to the strength of the current flowing. Magnet B is made of a piece of steel, which is first hardened and then magnetized. Needle C should be cut from a piece of sheet brass, and may be fastened to the magnet, either with rivets or solder, but care must be taken in doing this latter not to destroy the magnetism in the steel. By extending pointer C a considerable distance above pivot D, and placing a scale at its top end, it strikes me the operator would have a fairly efficient current indicator (provided the thing will work at all). It would even be possible to borrow an ammeter and calibrate the scale, thus making a crude ammeter.



Now, gentlemen, I don't know if this thing will work or not, but it will form an interesting experiment, and if it does work it will be great, since the operator will be enabled to make a current indicator which would, in effect, be an ammeter, at almost no cost at all. Magnet A would be made, I should say, of a core built up of pieces of sheet iron, which would then be wound with just a few turns of one of the arc circuit wires. These turns must not, however, be sufficient to set up any appreciable choke coil action. I am only giving this for what it is worth, and maybe it is not worth anything. I do not know how it will work out but, as I said before, it looks like a possibility—and there you are.

The Rights of the Patron.

A moving picture theater audience is, I think, the most shining example of an easy mark yet discovered. The things the payers of the nickels and dimes will stand for are almost unbelieveable and they stand for them, too, without a kick, mainly, I presume, because they don't really know what in thunder is the matter, or that they have a right to kick. They simply see that something is not right, but as to what is wrong they have not the faintest idea. They are likely to blame the operator for that which is entirely the manager's fault, and, vice versa, they frequently blame the manager for what is entirely the operator's fault. However, the fact remains that if moving picture theater audiences were more critical and registered their kicks vigorously and frequently to the manager it would be vastly to their benefit. The manager, if he be a real manager, can at least see that his screen is kept free from shadows and discolorations of the light. He can demand that much of his operator; also he can cause the films to be run at proper speed to bring out the full value of their action.

Except in very small towns where possibly the patronage is not sufficient to justify it, the manager can use enough current to produce a clear, white, brilliant picture. All these things can be done, and would be done, too, if patrons demanded them and put up frequent and vigorous howls to managers who do not "produce the goods" in these particulars. But, as I said, in the beginning, too often the chap who coughs up the dime does not really know what is wrong and (whisper) all too often the "manager" does not either; and again (whisper) too often the operator does not either—fine combination, but it is present in an amazing number of houses. When the patrons of picture theaters are educated to the fact that they have a right to complain if the projection is bad, just as much as they have when the theater is too cold, it will prove to be that much better for projection all around. In my humble opinion this should be done. If every manager who knows he has good projection were to display a slide advising patrons of their right to register a complaint when the projection is bad, he would soon set a pace that some of his go-as-you-please competitors would have to meet or get out.

From Palestine, Texas.

The accompanying photograph shows some of the members of the I. A. T. S. E., Local 521, Palestine, Texas. Beginning with the old gentleman sporting the ragtime cap, standing on the left, we see Douglas Potter, Oscar Bridges, Warren McFarlane, Virgil Bridges and O. B. Allstott. Brother Oscar Bridges is holding Harry Winner down with both hands, while Brother Warren McFarlane peeks over the glad headgear of Brother Will Thresto. I would like to ask one question about this picture, viz.: has Friend Allstott recently got religion? That is the only way I can account for that soulful, upward look. Joking aside, however, the boys are a bright-looking bunch, and they are furnishing amusement in a town where I lived for almost two years.

A Joke.

A letter comes from Fort Worth, Texas, the signature of which I am unable to make out. It reads as follows:

> Here is a real joke. Brother Smith, of our city, and I, were returning from the express office, whither we had conveyed the films. When half way up Main Street an officer, the captain by the way, looked Brother Smith over and in his best official growl said, "What's that y' got in yer hip pocket?" Horrors! I looked at the cop and Smith, but the cop's eyes were glued to a bulge under Friend Smith's coat-tails. Smith turned pale. The ghastly look on his face was something awful to behold. All is lost he wailed as he slowly and with a shudder of dread that shook the casements for blocks around, reached under his coat-tails, and abstracted from a hip pocket a copy of the Moving Picture World, which he politely handed to Mr. Policeman, asking him if he did not want to read it and learn something. Now wadda y' think of that? I had a queer experience a week ago. I put in a new condensing lens, struck an arc and let it get pretty hot and then let it cool off some. I then struck the arc again and allowed it to burn for fifteen or twenty minutes, after which I removed the lens and let it lie in the bottom of the lamp-house for a couple of days. I then put it in position. At one o'clock it started to crack just a little at the bottom edge. Gradually and slowly this crack extended up, and then around, in a fish-hook form in the center of the lens, completing the action about four o'clock. It was the oddest break I have ever seen. It was the first lens I had broken in a long time. I show first-run films and have a great deal of trouble with the emulsion sticking to the springs, but have overcome the greater part of the difficulty. Will send drawing of attachment, and a sample of the preparation I used, accompanied by a receipt for the same,

Brother Smith ought to be thoroughly ashamed of himself for thus dallying with the majesty of the law. However, inasmuch as he made up by offering to educate the gentleman, we will let it pass. Condensing lenses do some funny stunts at times. I have had lenses to break just as you describe, though it does not happen often. The tempering you speak of might do some good, though I rather doubt it. I am inclined to think those things are largely a matter of imagination. This is based on the fact that the only process I know of for annealing or changing the quality of glass is to heat it red hot and to allow it to cool off slowly during a period covering several days. However, if you think it helps, keep it up, as the practice certainly won't do any harm. Send on the drawing and the recipe.

Another Artist—Operator.

George L. McCann, Enid, Oklahoma, sends in a really excellent pen-drawn slide, the same being in three colors. He says he uses a very fine pen and a high grade of drawing ink, but that I am right about the ink spreading, although the black will not be as great an offender in this respect as the colors. Says when he uses colored ink he first outlines in black, in order to keep the colors from spreading, and then lays the glass on the picture from which he wishes to draw and traces it with the black ink, adding the colors afterward. Brother McCann states that he finds a frosted mirror is a splendid thing to make patches on, with a light above. Emery paper will frost the glass. He says Enid has a local union now, of which he is a member, which was chartered October 15th, and that projection in that little city is good.

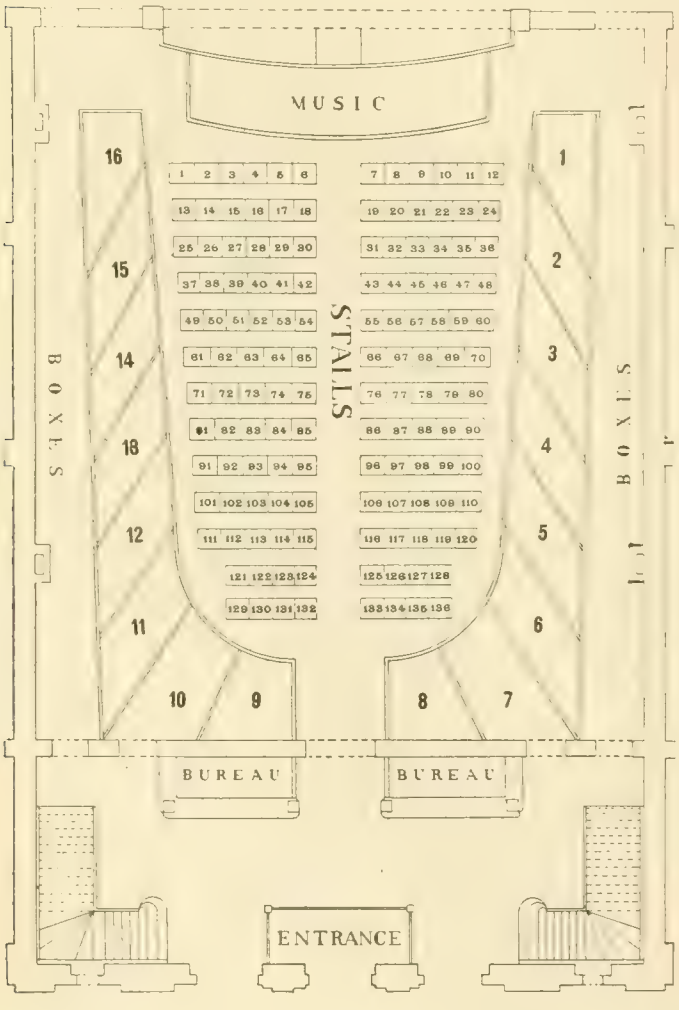
I am told that ink will not spread if the glass is heated. That if it be laid on the top of the lamp-house for a few minutes and then drawn on while the glass is still warm the ink will "stay put." Brother McCann's work is indeed very excellent. Well, I guess I will have to back up in my assertion that it is impossible to draw on raw glass. However, it is admitted that it cannot be done except with a special pen and considerable care. My compliments to the new local. May it live long and prosper.

New Theater in Pekin, China.

M. S. Ayer, manager, Arcade Amusement Company, Tientsin, China, writes:

> My Moving Picture World was cut off for three months, and, to tell the honest truth, I felt as if I was missing one of my regular daily meals; but the papers are coming regularly now and I am again happy. We are opening a new theater in Peking, China's capital, under the name of "The Peking Pavilion." As the winter is setting in we are doing our level best to have the building completed by the end of November, and will probably open it by the middle of December. I enclose cut of the seating plan for your perusal and comment. I have this day sent to Mr. Hallberg, of your city, with whom we deal, an order for a Power's Six A Cameragraph to be shipped as quickly as possible. We are at present using an Urban Silent Knight machine, but have had trouble with the lower loop, owing to the difference in pull of the take-up tension when the reel is only half full and full. We hope that the Power's loop setter will overcome this trouble.

In the first place, Brother Ayer, I would suggest that, presuming your Urban machine take-up to be driven by a belt, you put a belt tightener on, attaching same to an arm, with a handle placed in convenient position for the operator, so that he can slack up on the take-up belt at the beginning of the run and tighten it a little toward the end. This would be some bother, but it is a practical thing to do all right, and it has been done by a number of operators, who have overcome the same trouble in that way. Possibly my description is not very clear, but I believe you will catch the idea. It is something on the same principle as the motor drives illustrated on pages 370 and 371 of the Handbook, in which the speed is changed by means of a belt tightener. The floor plan is quite different from those of our American theaters, in that on the ground floor the central portion is taken up by thirteen rows of seats surrounded by stalls, or boxes, as shown.



The balcony has a section of 102 seats, known as the "dress circle," at the rear, with stalls or boxes at the side, the same as below, there being fourteen of the upper boxes. I publish the ground floor plan because I am of the opinion that here is something which might be, in a modified form, used in our own theaters to great advantage. In the West it is used, though in a very much modified way, the boxes or loges being placed either at the back of the auditorium, or the front of the balcony. Now, in theaters where the ceiling is high, and where there is no balcony, why could not a row of narrow ornamental loges be suspended from the ceiling, or supported in some substantial way, extending clear around the auditorium, the same as the boxes shown in sketch. These loges could seat four persons each, at 25 cents per person, where the admission is 10 and 15 cents, or at 15 cents where it is 5 and 10 cents, and you can bet your last dollar that you would find plenty of young sprouts who would like to cut a tremendously wide swath in taking their girls into a "box" at a few cents advance in price. I have not the space to dilate on this subject just now, but it is worth consideration by managers. The boxes should be nicely fitted up, with bow fronts and comfortable chairs.

Discoloration of Condenser Lenses.

Mr. J. Wall, Professor of Photography, Syracuse University, Syracuse, New York, says he has bought a copy of the Handbook and read it through. He points out several typographical errors and two or three basic ones, though he pronounces the book a very useful one, which no doubt is high praise, coming from a university professor. One error in particular is of interest, since it has served to bring out what seems to be the real explanation of something which has puzzled the editor for a long time, viz.: the discoloration (pink and purple) of condensing lenses under the action of heat. In the Handbook I said on page 363 "this was due to excess of one of the ingredients." Professor Wall corrects me as follows:

> The discoloration is not due to excess of one of the ingredients, but to the rotten system which glass smelters have of adding a very small quantity of a manganese salt to their flux; this gives a pink tint which masks a too strongly pronounced green tinge in the glass, and, therefore, apparently makes it more colorless. As a matter of fact what it does is to mask the green by making a gray of it, so that there is actually a greater loss of light than if the glass were green. In course of time the ultra-violet rays in the arc decompose the manganese silicate, whereupon the pink tinge appears, and the longer the lens is used the worse it becomes, until finally it is a very marked purple color. This phenomenon has been repeatedly noticed in window glass. If the users of lenses would put up with the green, it would be much better or, better still, if they would pay more for their condensers, the trouble would disappear altogether.

I am more than pleased to have this correction made. I have tried for a long time to find out just what the real reason for this discoloration was but without much success. The nearest I could get to it was a statement that it was an excess of manganese or some other property which I presumed to be an ingredient of the glass. It seems, however, from this that the pink and purple discoloration is really due to an effort on the part of manufacturers to foist off cheap green-tinted glass for a higher grade by hiding the green discoloration temporarily, well knowing that later on their trick would ruin the lens, and that even in the beginning it was not as good as it would be without the addition of the injurious ingredient. I feel that thousands of managers and operators are deeply indebted to Professor Wall for the information he has supplied. We now know that the purple discoloration is the result of what we might almost call a deliberate swindle on the part of lens manufacturers, and are in position to talk good and straight to the dealer who handles this kind of article.

As to the other errors pointed out by Professor Wall, they are mostly typographical, but there are one or two which deserve mention, viz.: (a) On line 7, page 140, in speaking of water resistance I say that copper sulphide may be used. The professor comments on this as follows:

> Copper sulphide is insoluble in water. It rapidly decomposes when dissolved in water, especially when heated, and gives off sulphuretted hydrogen that would stink out any theater in about ten minutes.

(b) On page 356 I give the method of measuring the focal length of the plano-convex lens, and he says I am in error, and corrects me as follows:

> With the plane side presented to the incident light the nodal point of emergence, from which the focus must be measured, is on the pole or vertex of the curved surface. With the convex side to the incident light the nodal point is practically one-third the thickness of glass from the vertex of curved surface.

The professor then gives the formula for measuring the lenses, but it would be Greek to anyone but a professor of optics, therefore it would be useless to give it.

I am not, of course, in a position to dispute Professor Wall did I desire to do so. I presume that he is correct, but the rule given in the Handbook was supplied me by the manufacturer of plano-convex lenses, and it was only obtained after a great deal of trouble. Nobody seemed to know what really was correct, as far as I could determine. I had at least half a dozen rules for measuring plano-convex lenses, each one presumably coming from an authority, and the one selected was selected because it appeared to frame up with common sense better than any of the others. However, Professor Wall may be considered an authority, and we therefore accept his decision in this matter as final.

Calcium Light.

Rosswell, Georgia, comments favorably on the Handbook, and then states there is one criticism he would like to make, as follows:

> You have nothing on calcium light operation. Now, there are a good many country shows using calcium light. Could you advise me where I can purchase a treatise on calcium light projection? I would appreciate the address of any publisher of such a work. Could an Edison-Goodyear calcium outfit be operated with advantage by changing the foci of the lenses of a Power's Six projecting a 10-foot picture on a mirroroide screen at 70 feet?

I do not know of any treatise on calcium lighting that is worth much more than the paper it is written on; perhaps there is, but I have not seen it. Can any of our readers suggest any book? Yes, you can reduce the size of your picture by getting lenses of longer focal length. You ought to be able to project a fairly good 6 to 8-foot picture on a mirroroide screen. At 70 feet you would want about an 8-inch objective lens with condensers to match for an 8-foot picture; I should say probably 7½ behind and 8½ in front ought to work all right. However, it would be better to have a shorter throw, owing to the loss of light between the lenses and the film where such long focal length objectives are used.

Freezing Carbons.

Mr. A. A. Johnson, Cranbrook, British Columbia, asks:

> Regarding current from a G. E. mercury arc rectifier; when the arc burns unsteadily and roars does it do any good to jam the carbons together and separate them repeatedly, and what effect has this on the tube?

When the arc roars it is usually an evidence that your carbons are too close together—your arc too short. Under these conditions it is likely that a cap of graphite will form on the tip of the lower carbon. Ordinarily when the arc is burning normally the carbon volatilized, or, in other words, dissipated in gas. With the carbons too close together, however, the arc does not receive sufficient air to enable it to volatilize all the carbon, and graphite is formed. Graphite has an enormous power of resistance to heat—a much greater resistance than has the carbon from which it was, in this instance, made, and the result will be that it will remain there and the lower carbon tip will burn in a mushroom shape. Eventually the graphite will burn away, but it may sometimes be knocked off by jamming the carbons together quite hard. Presumably this is exactly what has happened to you. First, you have carried your arc too short and acquired a graphite tip on the lower carbon; then you have jammed the carbons together, the effect being that the graphite was removed and the light brought back to normal. It is a poor practice, however, since in doing this you produce a bad effect on the screen, and, moreover, are likely to break off one of the carbons, or knock it out of line. The better way is to have a pair of arc glasses, enabling you to look directly at the arc, so that you can knock the obnoxious tip off with the point of a screw-driver. Freezing the carbons has the effect of removing the resistance of the arc and boosting the amperage, thus throwing a heavier load on the tube. However, as this lasts but a fraction of a second, I think no harm is done the tube.

A Question.

W. S. James, Camden, New Jersey, has raised a point which is of much interest. He says that if the light rays emerge from the objective in a straight line and do not begin to spread until they have reached a distance of several inches from the lens, then the focal length of the condenser is too great to match the focal length of the objective, meaning that the back combination of the objective lens is not receiving the light from the condenser so as to allow of the crossing of the rays between the front and back combination of the objective.

That answers something which has puzzled the editor for a long time. It hardly seems to me that Brother James can be correct in this matter, but if he is I would like to know it. Will Mr. James kindly advise the department as to what he bases this proposition on? Has he determined this matter by experiment, or how has he acquired the knowledge? We would like to know if he is correct or not.

Photometry.

Jos. H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas, writes as follows:

> Here are three facts relating to photometry which are interesting. Motion pictures, as a rule, require a light intensity of between 6,000 to 10,000 c.p. to project an A1 16-foot picture, and as 6,000 c.p. is the maximum obtainable from a.c. through the best auto-transformer, it is evident that the best a.c. under such conditions is not entirely satisfactory. In d.c. through a rheostat some have found relief, but the additional cost entailed by the loss of at least 60 per cent. energy drawn from the line is, of course, rather discouraging. Assuming a light intensity of 5,000 c.p. to be required it will be found from actual test, carefully made, that the following will be required to obtain that c.p. from a 110-volt current. With rheostat about 7 k.w., with d.c. through rheostat 2.25 k.w.; with auto-transformer 2.1 k.w.; with mercury arc rectifier 1.7 k.w. From the above we find a saving of 400 watts on 5,000 c.p. in favor of the rectifier on a run of ten hours, which would mean a saving of about $62 per year. Now, if we were using d.c. and wanted a light intensity of, say 7,000 c.p., it would take 3.1 k.w. from a 110-volt line through a rheostat, but would only take 2.15 k.w. with a rectifier, or a saving of 950 watts at ten hours per day, amounting to $296 per year.

I cannot quite see what the foregoing has to do with photometry, nor have I checked up Brother Smith's figures. Moreover, I do not know what actual tests he has made, from whence he gets his data. In fact, I have simply published this letter, without any idea of vouching for the correctness of the deductions, in the hope that it would set others to thinking and figuring, since the question raised is, of course, an important one. What Brother Smith is really driving at is the saving effect through the use of modern methods of rectification and voltage reduction. This is a very live topic and one well worthy of extended discussion.

Book Not Suitable.

Recently a correspondent recommended an electrical book published by the McGraw-Hill Book Company, New York City. I wrote this company to submit a copy for examination, and their reply is as follows:

> The Standard Handbook for Electrical Engineers is a highly specialized book, and would not be of any use to moving picture operators. The sale of this book is among electrical engineers only.

Excellent Replies from Seattle.

Mr. Stanley E. Babcock, Seattle, Washington, sends in excellent, and in the main, correct replies to questions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6, all in one bunch. They are notable as being the first correct replies to any of the questions coming from the Pacific Coast. I don't quite know what to make of this. I know there is a bunch of rattling good men out there, and men who are possessed of good technical knowledge, too, yet, so far, out of the many answers to questions received from Portland, Seattle, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Tacoma and other coast cities, every one has been a waste-basket proposition. Now, I know there are plenty of able men in Seattle, Tacoma, Portland, San Francisco and Los Angeles, so what's the answer?

Books on Electricity.

Peter Uckele, who is enroute with the Edison Talking Picture Company, says:

> I note you ask some of the operators to name electrical works which they have found of value. If I was in New York City this would be my plan: I would take the Moving Picture World with the questions and go to the nearest public library. In the free reading-room you will find a set of six books on electrical engineering, by the American School of Correspondence, or the International School. These books are of such nature that they can be understood by anyone. I would select the book on motors or generators; first, the motor, then the generator, and, believe me, the man who does this, and studies, will get on the Roll of Honor, and will also learn how to re-babbitt the bearings of his motor or generator properly. These books can be bought outright for about $18, or so much down and so much each week. The Western Electric Company, of Chicago, also sends out a number of bulletins which may be had by anyone who will write for them, and other bulletins are in course of preparation.

I have not seen the books the brother recommends, but will try to find time to examine them. I have written to the Western Electric Company for a copy of the bulletins he names, and if they seem to be of value will give their numbers later.

A Correction.

The Maggard-Bradley Company, Inc., Morehead, Kentucky, by its vice-president, Mr. A. M. Beatty, makes the following statement:

> In the issue of November 29th, you, without knowing it, have done us an injustice, in the article, "A New Projector." This machine is manufactured by this company. We have an application from the Knickerbocker Film Company to represent us in New York. Now your article gives full credit to the Knickerbocker Film Company, and it is to this we object. . . .

We regret exceedingly that this mistake has occurred. However, we do not feel in the least to blame, but make the correction with pleasure.

Nothing Doing.

Harold Weiss, Battle Creek, Mich., submits a correct answer to the "Puzzle," and trusts I will publish all the correct ones, which would mean that the whole department for two or three weeks would be taken up with replies to that quite simple little puzzle. By the way, brother Weiss, Merton Wentworth, of the Battle Creek Sanitarium of your city is the son of my father's sister and his mother and another one of my dad's sisters live there with him. If you see him tell him hello for me.

Union Slide.

Mr. G. H. Busch, Peoria, Ill., says we ran a picture of the union slide in the department some time ago, but he lost the copy of the paper in which it appeared. He wishes to know if we have a cut of the same slide, or some diagram, presumably from which one could be made. I have not. Write to Lee M. Hart, general secretary and treasurer of the I. A. T. S. E., Gaiety Theater Building, New York City, who will supply you with what you want if you are entitled to it.

An Odd Proposition.

A Kentucky correspondent wants to know if it would be possible to connect an economizer and a rheostat in multiple with each other; that is to say, connect the rheostat to the primary leads and to one of the secondary wires. I do not know what the exact effect of this would be, but I do not think it would work with any degree of satisfaction, and I also believe it would immediately set up trouble in the transformer. It is something I had never thought of before, and I will submit the question to our readers for their consideration. I would suggest that either Brother Preddy, of San Francisco, or Friend Hallberg could give us the dope on this particular problem.

"Me Too."

Brother H. W. Griggs, Milwaukee, Wis., writes:

> Am pleased at your comments on Mr. A. C. Stewart's "brain storm," December 6 issue. Mr. Stewart's ideas and suggestions as to reducing flicker are in line with what I have been experimenting on, and which I think I mentioned to you at one time. I can take the flicker out of the high lights and throw it into the shadows where it is not noticed. I do this by a deflected ray from the arc. It works, yes, but there is one minor defect to be overcome to make it complete, and this is what I occasionally dabble with when I have time.

Comment not necessary, I think. Here are two souls with but a single thought and two minds that scrap with the same problem. Success to you.

Comments on the Films

Licensed

"O, SAMMY" (Biograph), December 15.—A farce of grotesque Jewish noses. The situation is very good indeed, much better than the picture itself, which is by no means an artistic production.

"RILEY'S DECOYS" (Biograph), December 15.—Rival Irish boarding house keepers and a couple of stranded vaudeville girls have figured before in picture farces in which one proprietor gets the better of his competitor. It got its laugh.

"WITH EYES SO BLUE AND TENDER" (Selig), December 16.—Mabel Justice has added a bit of real life to a melodramatic situation and carried it on from that point. It is a bit more interesting than the melodrama without the touch of truth and has some sea backgrounds that are acceptable. As a whole a fair offering. In the background of the picture's story there seems to be a song. Perhaps, if this had been used by the pianist, it would have helped the effect materially.

"THE ACTRESS" (Edison), December 16.—A very pretty picture with a fair story by Richard Ridgely, who has used old things, to be sure; but has put a little freshness in them. Automobile accidents are a bit old style and not nearly so effective as formerly. The offering has the charm its players give it by their art and their personality. Mabel Trunnelle certainly supplies both, but is strong on art. Barry O'Moore plays very skilfully opposite to her and they are helped by Bessie Learn and others. Then the offering has pretty sets and fine backgrounds perfectly photographed. Mr. Ridgely produced it.

"LIFE'S WEAVING" (Essanay), December 16.—Plenty of perfectly made scenes beautifully photographed and good acting are here; but what it is all about we have no clear idea and we saw it twice. E. H. Calvert is most worthy notice, but not far behind him are Irene Warfield, Richard Travers and Wm. Bailey.

"THE COUPLE NEXT DOOR" (Patheplay), December 16.—A likable love story picture with an excellent situation; but there is much in it that, while perfectly clear, is not effective; because of its artificiality. Some of it is good comedy and there are many pretty scenes.

"WHEN HE SEES" (Lubin), December 16.—A weakly managed opening scene, followed by an obscure gap in the action, harms the impression of the opening of this picture. Toward the end, when a good situation is approaching, an expedient that is trite gives an easy and not very interesting close. The script is by Will M. Ritchey and Bert Brackin produced it.

"UP IN A BALLOON" (Vitagraph), December 16.—Two of the Vitagraph people really go up in a balloon. In the picture's story, it makes a novel way to get away from Ma and Pa, who don't want the young man for son-in-law. James Young, who wrote the script and produced it, has bettered the incident with some fresh fun and it makes a very fair offering. The photographs are rather poor in several of the scenes.

"ELEPHANTS AT WORK" (Vitagraph), December 16.—Just a bit that is interesting and welcome. This same thing has been pictured at least twice before.

"BRONCHO BILLY'S CHRISTMAS DEED" (Essanay), December 20.—A characteristic offering with the usual Western setting, in which Broncho Billy, as sheriff, releases the burglar on Christmas day. He himself pays back the amount stolen. There is a Christmas tree and a happy child with a drum at the close.

"THE HAUNTED BEDROOM" (Edison), December 20.—This screen presentation of a story by Rita is creepy enough to please the most hardened observer. Double photography is employed to show the ghost of Paul, guarding the money he hid in the haunted room. This is a sure enough ghost story and is subject to all the objections some people make to this type of entertainment, but on the other hand many observers will enjoy its thrill. Mabel Trunnelle, Jack Strong and Augustus Phillips are in the cast.

"THE ELECTRICIAN'S HAZARD" (Kalem), December 20.—This is a photoplay of about ordinary strength, in which the girl saves the young electrician from the rival, who would have allowed the current to be turned on too soon. The plot is not the most convincing. While Jim might have been willing to see the hero die, it strained a point that the other man should aid him so willingly. The outdoor settings are very pleasing and the photography good.

"THE FIRE BRIDE" (Patheplay), December 20.—A strong adaptation of a novel by Yvanoff, a Russian writer. The snow scenes and Russian settings prove very novel and pleasing. The story is tragic in its denouement, but finely handled and legitimate in its effects. Michael, the blacksmith, invades the wedding ceremonies and bears away the bride by force. They perish together in the burning blacksmith shop. A powerful offering of the tragic kind.

"THE CONSCIENCE OF HASSAN BEY" (Biograph), December 20.—This story of the Harem is notable for its strong atmosphere of the Orient and good photographic effects. The incidents themselves have a grewsome tinge, the death of the slave girl from a serpent's bite being especially so. Hassan Bey, conscience stricken, restores the daughter of the rug dealer to her lover, and he himself is killed by the serpent's sting. Lacks lighter scenes, but a strong offering of its type.

"A LOVE OF '64" (Lubin), December 20.—This story of Civil War days features Ormi Hawley as a girl spy. The chief scene is where she feigns blindness and is allowed to fall through a bridge partly torn up, this during active skirmish firing between the opposing troops. The Union hero risks his life to save her. This is not the usual overwhelming reproduction of warfare, but makes an interesting episode and is helped out by smooth photography and attractive scenery.

"FALLING IN LOVE WITH INEZ" (Edison), December 17.—A farce of suitors for the hand of Inez, whose uncle is as cross as a bear. One can't help laughing, but the laughter does not come from the heart. One is apt to feel when laughing at young lovers that he is laughing at what he himself was once. Its author is Mark Swan and it was produced by C. Jay Williams. The players do well, but there is nothing especially brilliant in their work.

"HELLO TROUBLE" (Essanay), December 17.—A cleverly written farce that is truly laughter-making. The freshness and the unexpected turns that its primary satuation takes, make one expect almost anything to develop before all the trouble in that telephone is used up. Charles Stine, as the grouchy architect, and "Bobbie" Bolder, as the stern lawyer, make the best fun, but it is a picture in which the situation is first and the actor second.

"ANY PORT IN A STORM" (Vitagraph), December 17.—There is fun in this farcical story, but the picture is full of artificial suggestions, due to the unconvincing atmosphere around the characters. The girls especially are more like summer girls than the daughters of salt water skippers. The picture was taken around the boats, nets and cabins of a fishing village, and makes a very fair offering. T. H. Bridson wrote the script and it was produced by W. J. Bauman.

"BUSTER'S LITTLE GAME" (Selig), December 17.—Buster, the cowboy (William Duncan), gets a legacy and decides to go to college. Six years later he comes back in disguise as a tenderfoot and the girl (Myrtle Stedman) thinks he can't ride, so she makes a promise to marry him when he can keep on an especially ugly broncho. He at once proceeds to do it. The only fault is that the idea is too slight; there isn't enough body to the offering.

"INSECTS THAT SING" (Patheplay), December 17.—Each installment of Raymond Ditmar's series on natural history brings it home more forcibly that brains and a moving picture camera are a hard combination to beat when one is looking for things of interest and value. In this offering he has chosen merely crickets and katy-dids, but has managed to make us pretty well acquainted with them. Some photographs might have given glimpses of all kinds of insects that we can see in nature for ourselves.

"NICA" (Patheplay), December 17.—On the same reel are some lovely views of a lovely city.

"BEYOND ALL LAW" (Biograph), December 18.—Picture of a foolish wife, who, without reason, brings about an idiotic tragedy. It takes place in a backwoods community filled with beautiful scenes; especially fine is a wild torrent with a heavy waterfall. The story is brutal for, except the man chase with which it closes, it isn't even truthfully elemental.

"THE TRAIL OF THE SNAKE BAND" (Essanay), December 18.—The snake band is a hat ornament which the hold-up man has dropped and the cowboy hero innocently picks up. There is a bar-maid heroine and a gambler, but the story is fresh and has marked suspense in spite of its closeness to other stories we have seen. The reason is the snappy, vigorous way in which it is produced.

"CITIES OF JAPAN" (Melies), December 18.—Taken in cherry blossom time, these views of Yokohama, "the cherry blossom city," as well as those of Nara and of Kyoto, once the Capital City, are most acceptable. There is very welcome information in such pictures as this. The photographs are clear enough.

"UNTIL THE SEA" (Selig), December 18.—A variation on Enoch Arden, dealing with humble sea shore folk. The theme is very common and there is little suspense until the end. It is picturesque in places.

"THE FACE OF FEAR" (Vitagraph), December 18.—Vitagraph Indian pictures are not very common and have usually been vigorous. This one, by William McLeod Rain, is no exception to the rule; it surely is not lacking in suspense. The chief reason of its new interest lies in its apparent truth. It convinces, but is wholly an elemental story and its theme is nothing other than a brutal game with life as the stake; but it is not unwholesome. The backgrounds make it more impressive. The producer is W. J. Bauman. Otto Lederer, as the leading horse thief Indian, is about all that could be desired, and George Kunkel is a good second. Thomas Colmesnil with George Cooper play the two soldiers who are sent to arrest them and acquit themselves as well.

"THE GIRL AT THE LUNCH COUNTER" (Vitagraph), December 19.—There is good comedy in this picture. It is made in part by John Bunny as the uncle of Cutey, who courts a young widow, portrayed by Lillian Walker. Uncle comes to the college town to prevent a disgraceful marriage, but falls before the wiles of the charmer. Flora Finch contributes to the general hilarity, she also being concerned in the administration of the college lunch room. It is in a comedy of this sort that Miss Walker is at her best, and so she is here. The script is by James Young.

"THE LURE OF THE ROAD" (Selig), December 19.—This well-staged picture will interest, especially in the last half. It is a story of a wandering minstrel who marries and settles down; after a half dozen years the lure of the road is too strong for him and he leaves his family. A year later he returns, and from a distance sees an attack by robbers on his home. He rescues the besieged and rejoins his family.

"FRAYED FAGIN'S ADVENTURES" (Kalem), December 19.—A short comedy in which John Brennan plays the tramp. A hospital employee takes smallpox-infected clothes to the middle of the highway to burn them; for some reason he does not. The tramp makes his selection. Then things happen. Mildly amusing.

"ULSTER DAY IN BELFAST" (Kalem), December 19.—On the same reel are several topical pictures, all of them of interest. There is just a flash of a fair at Stratford, which might also have shown a bit of the town.

"A SCANDINAVIAN SCANDAL" (Patheplay), December 19.—Pearl Sindelar and Charles Arling have the leads in this fun-making comedy. The story is the not new one of the servant girl answering a "husband wanted" ad, and through inadvertence inclosing the photopragh of her mistress. It just happens the head of the house is very jealous and what he discovers is inclined to make him worse. The picture should make a hit.

Licensed Specials.

"THE HUNCHBACK" (Kalem), December 15.—Unquestionably the general situation and the characters of this picture are interesting, but one can't help seeing that the girl is not quite normal. Her morbid treasuring of the memory of the accident, in childhood days, which was due to her and the innocent cause of injury to a playmate, is not truly interesting. Then again, when "Humty Jackson," the slum thug, overhears her confession to her sweetheart and claims to be the boy whom she had pushed over in play, why didn't she ask him some questions? The spectator was asking how the rich boy came to be the terror of the slums; she assumed that it was all right. These things break the back of the picture's story. If it weren't for them it would be a strong offering. Alice Joyce plays the girl. Tom Moore makes Humpty Jackson and very interesting scoundrel.

"THE SUNKEN TREASURE" (Cines), December 16.—A spectacular, two-part special offering without much story. The picture's feature is a few under-the-ocean scenes with divers seeking for treasure and fish about them. They are very beautiful and worth seeing; but the offering has little else but good scenes well photographed to its credit.

"THE STOLEN LEGACY" (Cines), December 9.—There is a good story in these two reels, and it is well put on. The tale is of a man who through murder, obtains possession of a hidden fortune and becomes respected and influential, living in a palatial home and taking to himself a charming wife. The daughter of the murdered man has been raised by gypsies. When grown to womanhood she is sent to rob the home of the man who had wronged her family. Just why a woman should have been selected to perform a burglary when there were two men in the party is not clear, unless it was for the purpose of confronting the murderer. The meeting makes a most dramatic situation. There are many good scenes in the picture, which interests all the way.

"UNCLE TOM'S CABIN" (Kalem), December 17.—A two-part offering more effective than any one, two, or multiple-reel picturization of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" that we have seen. It has its faults, but its excellencies more than balance them. The best in it is the Simon Legree played by Hal Clemmons, and the strongest portrayal of the part that this reviewer has even seen anywhere. This picture is in itself a comment on the presupposition that any and every "big" story needs four or five reels to put it over adequately. It ought to be axiomatic that the fewer the reels a producer can get along with, the stronger his work will be. By the way, the Kalem people are earning the right to be counted experts on Southern stories.

"THE SON OF HIS FATHER" (Lubin), December 18.—A story with human interest and sufficiently well put on to make an interesting offering. In part, it is well acted and in part very poorly. Joseph Smiley, as the father who deserts his wife and baby yet in comfortable circumstances, and Clarence Elmer, as his son, who finds him in the end when, after a Western bar-room gun fight, the lad is wounded and recognized, both act acceptably. There are some lovely scenes and excellent photographs. Its author is George Terwilliger and it was produced by J. Joseph Smiley.

"THE FINGER OF FATE" (Patheplay), December 18.—The best offering among the licensed regular features for several days, and there have been other good ones. It is the most coherent and best acted Patheplay made in America that we remember in a month or two. It isn't great, especially the happy ending, but well done and restrained. The heroine is a fond girl attracted by a young doctor and walking in dangerous places. Her old mother watches with apprehension in the background. Some clever camera work changes the story from actuality to a dream, yet it is carried on as though without a break. In the dream the story has its probable ending, the fate of a woman gone wrong, given in detail but decently. The acting makes it very effective. Then the dreamer wakes and the actual story is closed with a marriage. Irving Cummings plays the role of the doctor, with Eleanor Woodruff as the young woman, and Marguerite Risser as the society girl he dreams he marries.

"THE STIGMA" (Essanay), December 19.—We are not told who is the author of this two-reel subject, but we are bound to say that the writer was trying harder to make a picture than he was to create entertainment. Entertainment it is not. Good acting and fine natural backgrounds are present—Francis Bushman has the lead, but even he cannot overcome the handicap imposed upon him. The story is of a girl washed ashore from a wreck. She is taken into the home of a man and woman, and their son falls in love with her. She is always pushing everyone away from her. She shrinks from them as if she were afraid she would convey to them some dread disease. We find a little later that she has leprosy—an affliction with which a mighty few persons in any state know anything about. The upshot is that when the young man leaves his home to go with her she leaves him asleep at the foot of a tree and jumps over a cliff. He sees her leap and follows her. The final scene is of the two at the foot—the woman dead, the man dying.

"THE ANCIENT ORDER OF GOOD FELLOWS" (Vitagraph), December 20.—There is a fine Christmas flavor about the fore part of this two-reel offering. Hughey Mack makes an ideal "cop" and his friendship with the women and children gets hold of the observer. It also gets Hughey into trouble, as a robbery occurs on his beat while he is off buying presents. The events in the second reel were so stirring and tragic that they almost destroyed the Christmas spirit of the peace. It is difficult to get a reaction to lightness on the part of the observers after a scene like the death of the kidnapper. The photography and acting is all that could be desired.

Independent

"HER BROTHER'S PARD" (Ammex).—This is a Western picture, of a type not only of the early West, but also of the early Western subject. While in the several reels there is but one drowning and one murder, there are many instances of gun stuff and bar-room adventures. It is too lurid and too melodramatic to serve as entertainment, except in exceedingly primitive communities.

"THE DEADLINE" (Nestor), January 7.—David M. Hartford, as the "Cattle King" in this Western drama, plays convincingly and is well supported. The story is gathered about a war between some sheep herders and the cattlemen on a Western range.

"THEIR LITTLE ONES" (Joker), January 3.—A farce romance between a widow and a widower who talk of "their little ones" before the ceremony and then begin to fear, thinking of the size of the children, but each is in the same box. The idea has been used before, but has been played in good farce spirit and the offering can safely be commended as a good, laughable offering for all kinds of audiences.

"SAM SLAMEM SLAMMED" (Imp), January 5.—This comedy was written and produced by E. Mason Hopper. It is not strong as a laugh-maker.

"THEM OL' LETTERS" (Powers), January 5.—A drama of retrospection, in which the inmate of a home for Civil War veterans is reminded of the love affair of his youth by some old letters of his sweetheart who, because he was thought dead in the Civil War, married another man. The captions are in verse. The film presents a short, graphic battle scene.

"THE ROSE OF SAN JUAN" (American), December 27.—In which the hero, portrayed by Sidney Ayres, falls in love with a Mexican girl and awakens the animosity of a rival, played by Jack Richardson. The scenes in this were hurriedly put together and the peon's work in changing the cartridges was done too openly to be impressive. The photography is pleasing and the story a fairly entertaining one.

"THE PSUEDO PRODIGAL" (Reliance), December 17.—A fairly strong story, in which the prodigal son deserts a girl. Later his father falls in love with her and marries her. The son, discovering their happiness on his return, again leaves. The work of Miriam Cooper as the girl was particularly interesting, her face being expressive and well adapted to screen work.

"THE FLY LEAF OF FATE" (Reliance), December 22.—An unusually artistic number, with Henry Walthal, Consuello Baily and Anna Luther in the leads. The scenes occur in a bookstore. Mary's love for the hero remains true through many vicissitudes and she finally wins him. A pretty story, well photographed and very pleasing throughout.

"THE LAW OF HUMANITY" (Princess), December 19.—The young husband's eyes are injured in an explosion and his employer refuses to aid himself and family. Later the children eat poisonous tablets, thus bringing the two families together in a common affliction. Muriel Ostriche and Boyd Marshall appear in this number, which makes quite an appealing little story.

"HIS FATHER'S WIFE" (Thanhouser), December 26.—This proves an entertaining number. The broker falls prey to a designing woman, only to learn the truth after he has married her. His final will, leaving all his property to his son, falls into the hands of the Thanhouser kidlet, who does her part very cleverly. A pleasing offering, in which the action is nicely proportioned throughout.

"THE HEAD WAITER" (Thanhouser), December 28.—In which a head waiter falls in love with a society woman. She gives him a card and requests him to call, but it is only to offer him employment as butler. The story awakens more sympathy for the head waiter than laughter at his expense. This proves a fairly amusing offering.

"A FOOL AND HIS MONEY" (Rex), Here we see the Smalleys in a farce. It is well put on. Phillips Smalley has the role of an impecunious good dresser who accepts money from a small restaurant cook for introducing him to good society. The family to which the finder of the valuable pearl is sent lives in a beautiful home, set amid most picturesque grounds. Lois Weber is the daughter of the house, and it is she that the newlyrich tries to win. He fails. The sketch will amuse.

"FIGHTING IS NO BUSINESS" (Crystal), January 6.—Here is a laughmaker. It is straight Jewish comedy. The only Gentile in it is the big husky boxer, who always wins the money or rather saves his own $500 which he has offered to any one who can stand up to him. The slim one who is misled by his friends and induced to enter the squared circle lasts but a moment. At the first blow he goes to the floor and tries to crawl out from under the ropes. His antagonist chases him through the streets right to the arms of a policeman. Ben Goetz produced the picture.

"SHADOWED" (Crystal), January 6.—Rather slight comedy, in which the leads are played by Pearl White and Chester Barnett. The story is of a wife whose suspicions of her husband are aroused by a note which she finds. Attired in men's garb, she follows him. She has a narrow escape from arrest for impersonating an officer, but, owing to her lightness of foot, she is able to get home. Resuming proper clothing, she fools the detective. Then her husband explains.

"A TALE OF A LONELY COAST" (Rex), November 27.—A simple story in which Bob Leonard and Marguerita Fischer have the leads.

"PRINCE" (Kay-Bee), January 2.—This story is well pictured and features a coach dog, which is the pride of the fire station. Quite a lot of excitement is worked up in the fire scene and there is a good heart interest. This latter would have been stronger if the dog had rendered a real service, instead of one that was unnecessary because of the alarm being turned in.

"THE TRIALS OF ALEXANDER" (Imp), January 1.—This is a breezy farce comedy with a young clubman, who is unlucky in love, for a hero. With the help of fellow clubmen he finally succeeds in winning the lady of his desires and in these efforts is the comedy contained. The story has a unique beginning and ending, both appearing in a cabbage patch.

"AND THE VILLAIN STILL PURSUED HER" (Nestor), January 2.—This is very much and very good burlesque. Few people can fail to laugh at the antics and counter antics of the desperate villain and the beautiful heroine and their friends and accomplices. A bunch of firemen, who are more laughable than useful, is not the least of the fun.

"THE LIFTED VEIL" (Crystal), January 4.—This is not so much a drama as it is a series of pictures depicting the harm which a rich man's money does. A love story is woven in through the scenes and if interest does not depend so much on how the whole affair is going to turn out, the film has the other merit of pointing an old truth.

"CUE AN MISS-CUE" (Eclair), January 4.—There is considerable fun in this fantasy of a pool player who falls asleep and dreams all manner of things about his cue.

"NUTTY HAS BIG IDEAS" (Eclair), January 4.—Two men appear in this farce with toy balloons for heads and some laughable situations grow out of this. The subject is only half a reel long, the preceding filling the first half.

Independent Specials

"AN ORPHAN'S ROMANCE" (Thanhouser), December 23.—A two-reel offering, featuring Maude Fealy as an orphan girl, who is taken into the home of an aunt. The transition from the streets to high society was very abruptly shown and lacked conviction. The later scenes, in which the girl wins the love of her cousin's friend, were much stronger. Harry Benham appears as the man. The story has certain elements of interest and proves quite entertaining.

"THE SHRINER'S DAUGHTER" (American), December 22.—A two-reel number, featuring a convention of the Shriners in California. The story was clearly made up to fit the occasion, but answers very well considering this. It begins with a rivalry for the hand of a girl. The unsuccessful one later makes away with his rival's child and takes her West, where she grows up, thinking he is her father. The real father comes West with the Shriners and is taken to the hospital, where the girl is employed as a nurse. George Field, Edward Coxen and Winnifred Greenwood play the leads in this fairly strong offering.

"IN THE FIRELIGHT" (American), December 29.—A two-reel number, based upon a very old theme, but working out in a manner that interests the observer and leaves a pleasing impression upon his mind. The opening scenes on the farm were characteristic and well handled. Edward Coxen and Charlotte Burton appear as the young couple, and George Field as the city man, who lures the girl away. Later, when she has been cast off, the country boy searches for her and takes her back home. The acting and photographic effects are the strongest features of this number.

"KING, THE DETECTIVE" (Imp), December 29.—Another two-reel number, featuring King Baggot in his semi-serious detective work. Mr. Baggot is best when he enacts this with broad burlesque, as, of course, none of the situations are to be taken too seriously. The plot of this unfolds a little too vaguely, but it is well pictured and certainly of an enjoyable character. Ethel Grandin is the girl in the case.

"THE WATER WAR" (Bison), December 20.—This two-part story is written and produced by Henry McRae. It was made to fit the official opening of a great aqueduct, the topical scenes of which will interest. From a dramatic standpoint the picture is marred by overacting on the part of several in the cast, the leading villain being one of the chief offenders. There are three explosions, or two anyway. There would seem to be insufficient motive on the part of the boss malefactor for any such murderous manifestations as we see. There is in the cast an Indian girl, who takes a lively interest in preventing disaster and who always seems to be on the job, although the occasion for this active participation is not quite clear.

"HIS FATHER" (Frontier), December 27.—This conventional story is overacted at times. The tale is of a man being pushed out of town, leaving behind him a wife and son. Twenty years later he tries to rob the house of the son, knowing only that there is $5,000 in the home, but not knowing the owner. In the struggle which ensues the mother enters the room and prevents the son shooting his father.

"THE FEMALE OF THE SPECIES" (Rex), January 1.—This is a two-reel production of the Smalleys—Lois Weber as a gypsy girl in the lead, Philips Smalley as a sheriff, and Rupert Julian as an outlaw, a part not well suited to him. He plays best as a society rascal. The sheriff becomes infatuated with the gypsy, but is persuaded by his sweetheart's mother to give her up. In pursuing the outlaw whom her father tries to help escape, he encounters her again and she sacrifices her life to save his. This is a good story.

"THE MAGIC SKIN" (Victor), January 5.—This two-reel drama was based on the story of similar title by Honore de Balzac. J. Warren Kerrigan plays the part of the young man to whom the old curiosity dealer gives the magic skin. This skin enables the young man to wish for anything and get it, but with each wish the skin grows smaller. When it vanishes the young man dies. This story has been admirably done. It will certainly be well received.

"THE CHASE OF CHERRY PURCELLE" (Eclair), January 7.—We are not exactly impressed that the principal lady in this three-reel drama of crime and criminals is the cleverest woman in the world. She appears as quite an ordinary adventuress, one of a gang of fake wiretappers for whom she acts as a decoy. Belle Adair takes this part and she handles it well. She is always a convincing actress and it is unfortunate that she has no better story here to interpret. Alec B. Francis, as Coke Morgan, a dope fiend, gives an excellent interpretation. As a whole, the acting, the settings and all the work of producer and scenario writer are better done than the story warrants.

"THE LIE" (Gold Seal), January 6.—This is a very good two-reel production concerning an old man who was too strict with his children, a boy and a girl. Both almost going to the bad in a scrape with a gambler teaches the father that too much strictness does not pay. The story is interestingly presented and holds the interest from the beginning. It is perhaps a little drawn out in places, but on the whole the film is a commendable one.

"A MILITARY JUDAS" (Broncho), January 7.—A three-reel offering, written by Wm. H. Clifford. Two brothers love the same girl and she, of course, prefers the black sheep. The usual Southern setting is pictured; the war scenes come on in good form, with some pleasing variations from former productions. The scene in which the Northern spy meets Jim at the gambling house is well put on. Later Jim sells information to pay his debts and the good brother is suspected. Jim confesses the truth and kills himself. The production is well constructed throughout and holds the interest. The close is strong and logical.

"BY WHOSE HAND" (Great Northern).—There are many excellent factors in this three-reel subject, filled with good acting. In the second part approximately a half reel is given over to the father of the young man under arrest for murder, and not a foot of the film is wasted. It is a remarkable piece of work and holds all the way. Another member of the cast whose work stood out was that of the man who played the butler. The daughter of the pawnbroker showed unusual skill in the handling of her part. In fact, it was a finely balanced cast. The photography and settings were Great Northern. As to the manner in which the gun was discharged—from heat generated by the rays of the sun passing through a magnifying glass—there may be some skeptics. Also, it did seem strange that the recoil from the weapon did not drop the finely-balanced weapon to the floor. Nevertheless, it is a splendid picture.

"THE FORTUNE HUNTERS" (Blache Features).—This multiple-reel subject is not only over-melodramatic, but in various places shows carelessness in construction—the doing of improbable things in order that desired results may be obtained. For instance, that the villain may have knowledge of the contents of a letter the maid leaves the envelope, which is unsealed, on a table, the bold bad man being in the same room. Again, when the true lover is sent through a trap door into the sluiceway no attempt is apparently made to learn who was responsible for the attempt on his life. A man who poses as a doctor and who writes prescriptions has not been shown to have any knowledge of medicine. There was nothing indicated as to any attempt by a doctor to put the police authorities on the trail of the false one who throttled him into such sudden unconsciousness. In one scene the heroine enters the picture on one side just as the villain, unseen, goes out of it on the other. The sinking canoe was palpably on the bottom of the river. The real doctor, from behind a curtain, sees a nurse accomplice administer medicine to the patient, and in spite of the fact that it may be a poison, he makes no attempt to stop her. When the real doctor is kidnapped and taken across the lake on a cabined motor boat it is on the top of the superstructure that he is bound, where he may be seen plainly; the object, of course, is to permit the aviator to discover him. When the doctor was seized and taken from his patient's home the heroine made no attempt to notify the police. The use of double exposure where the restored patient appears to the bogus doctor was unnecessary; it would have been more convincing had he appeared in the flesh.

VITAGRAPH GIVES 2½ TONS OF TURKEY.

Two and a half tons of turkey, more than three hundred big birds, were ordered from Maryland by the Vitagraph Company and given away to their players and employees on the day before Christmas. Every year, about two months previous to the holiday, an order reaches the turkey raisers from the Vitagraph Company, which reads: "Begin fatening up the turkeys. We will need from three to four hundred." This means that several big farmers get busy at once getting the chestnut-fed turkeys ready for the three hundred or more Christmas dinners, at which they will be served.

It was amusing to see the Vitagraph force leaving the studios the day before Christmas, each carrying a big turkey under their arms, with its long legs hanging out at one end of the bundle, and its head and neck out of the other. This has been known at the Vitagraph studios as "The Turkey Parade." This year it was called "The Turkey Trot." One of the requirements relative to being in the "parade" is that everyone must carry his own turkey home. As many live long distances away, in Brooklyn and New York, no small amount of amusement was aroused in the elevated trains, subways and street cars when they bustled in with their turkeys. John Bunny, being the most portly man at the studio, received the largest turkey. He got a prize bird weighing thirty pounds. The confirmed old bachelors had the privilege of taking the equivalent value of the turkey in money, with which to buy themselves cigars or whatever else they might desire. There are not many confirmed bachelors with the Vitagraph Company, and it was noticed that what few there are looked with envy at the happy married men who were taking home a big savory turkey to a joyous family.

"Sixty Years a Queen."

Life and Times of Queen Victoria Illustrated in an Educational Multiple Reel of W. G. Barker.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

A LIVING picture of a great epoch shown by the producer at a Hotel Astor ball-room drew a large and representative audience and set many of them to thinking hard, not only because of the feature's intrinsic merits, but because of the artistic completeness of its presentation as well. The appropriate music, harmonizing with every phase of the screen portrayal was beyond doubt, a powerful factor in the interest generally felt, and Mr. Barker's running comment proved to be the finishing touch on a delightful performance. A lady near me wittily remarked that if anything was needed to complete the "atmosphere" of the piece, his decided accent supplied it.

Scene from "Sixty Years a Queen"

The feature is a visualized biography, presenting the history of Victoria's reign from the point of view of her immediate environment. It is a representation of the good queen's relation to her times, a difficult task under all circumstances and especially so in a sincere attempt to be authoritative. It does not show her to any great extent as she stood firmly against corrupting influences of her times, nor how her knowledge of those times shaped her course, but it beautifully portrays the romantic, familiar and touching sides of her career and does this through the more impressively through a remarkable choice of types to represent the remarkable woman.

Meeting of Queen Victoria and Dickens—Scene from "Sixty Years a Queen."

There are some striking suggestions in the excruciating formality of court scenes, vanishing social states that will always furnish picturesque backgrounds for the drama. We can hardly realize that forms devised to make an impression on childish minds are so recently in use among English speaking people. The English temperament is, however, on view, with all its passionate patriotism, its struggle between practical energy and stupefying adherence to tradition—possibly the most fascinating part of this presentation was what it suggested to men and women of broad ideals who sat watching it in silence.

A number of Englishmen present applauded the flag and the troops as small boys do our own emblem in the picture shows, but the deepest impress made on thinking people was that enforced by the good queen's character as a mother and wife, as a woman compelled by all that bears on the formation of character to live a noble life. So far as I am concerned, the most interesting episode shown was that picturing her relations with Charles Dickens. The great author was of the people and, in spite of his many petty vanities, for the people, his heart reaching out in such world-wide sympathy that it softened those of millions who understood him.

Queen Victoria was one of those millions, one of his most ardent admirers, but he was little impressed by what she apparently represented, privilege for the few and hardship for the many. He declined titles and other honors commonly bestowed by those of inherited rank, even refusing to visit the queen on pressing and personal invitation. It was in the year before his death that she finally prevailed upon him to grant her an interview, and her infinite tact is shown in her presenting him a book of her own inscribed "from the humblest author to one of the greatest."

The best portions of this feature present us with knowledge of a kind that furnishes food for the imagination and enables us to project our minds farther afield in new paths of thought, forming, as they do, a veritable poem of a great ruler's intimate life.

Harry C. Myers.

Lubin Actor-Director Who Has Risen from the Ranks and Become a General Favorite.

ON THE screen, even more than on the stage, personality counts. With the voice silenced the camera catches the very essence of the actor's individuality—if it exists. Few photoplayers are as successful as Harry C. Myers in giving to the picture public their real selves. Away from the Lubin Studio Mr. Myers is exactly as he is known to his admirers all over the world.

Harry C. Myers.

He is a happy-go-lucky big boy who shoulders, but is never weighed down by the responsibility of directing every photoplay in which he plays the principal role. A big scene employing two hundred extras does not disturb him, nor does an intricate bit of business which must be "got over" in fifteen feet of film. He is never too busy to call out a cheery greeting to a fellow player; neither is he too self-centered to play up to a member of his company.

Mr. Myers has been associated with Lubin productions for so long that he laughingly declares he goes with the lease! For purposes of comparison it is interesting to see one of the films of those days. In most of them the young actor-director of to-day may be seen filling in as a supernumerary. Soon he was given more to do; then was made leading man, and, finally, about three months ago, he directed his first production. Within twelve weeks he has finished fifteen photoplays. His results are remarkable and can only be accounted for by Mr. Myers' habit of close observation during his years in photoplay.

Myers' skill at make-up is rarely called into play. His admirers have often signified their preference for him as he is, so he has little opportunity to equal his wonderful characterization of the Indian halfbreed in the "Price of a Silver Fox." In this make-up he completely altered his features—a feat accomplished after hours of experimenting. When he strolled on the scene his fellow players were amazed at the transformation.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

IT was a wise person who remarked that a really big man is never pompous. Which saying is recalled to mind by a mighty pleasant half hour's chat on an early Saturday afternoon with David W. Griffith. It is a remarkable fact that the most striking figure in the motion picture industry—the man who in whole truth may be said to have done more than any other to advance and bring us now to the day of the universal recognition of the greatness of the screen as a factor in the amusement world—it is, we repeat, a remarkable fact that for so many years the identity of this man should practically have been unknown outside of trade circles. The reason is simple. It was the policy of his employers that the public had no legitimate right to any knowledge of the personality of the men and women who made and appeared in their pictures. There was no belief in, there was utter repudiation of, the theory that the interest of the public was heightened in the productions of a company by a knowledge of the human elements entering into the construction of them—even if that information be restricted to the names of producer and players. In line with this business practice of the Biograph Company—it is now nearly a year since its abandonment, by the way—was the unusual disinclination of Mr. Griffith for publicity. He apparently cared little for it. This attribute was forcibly brought to the attention of the director's associates just after his recent alliance with the Mutual forces. They advised him to make public by means of an advertisement in the trade press a list of some of the successful pictures produced under his guidance. It was only after repeated urging that he consented.

The writer had gone to the Broadway studio of the Reliance Company to have a talk with Henry Walthall. He had met Philip Mindil, old-time newspaper man and all-around live wire, who is at the head of the Mutual's most efficient publicity bureau. Mr. Mindil is good to meet. When a man delays his departure for a half holiday on a sunny afternoon in the height of the Christmas shopping season just to entertain an intruding scribe and retains his affability you respect him.

Hopp Hadley, secretary of the Screeners and associated with Mr. Mindil, undertook to guide us about the studio. Near to the Broadway end of the building Jim Kirkwood was seated in a comfortable chair, his long frame sunk into its depths as he meditatively watched and guided the rehearsal of the players under him. We wandered to the Sixteenth Street part of the studio. Under lights fiercer than any that ever beat on a throne stood Blanche Sweet and Mae Marsh rehearsing a scene in the forthcoming feature production of Paul Armstrong's "The Escape." In the play the two are sisters. Miss Sweet uttered no word. Her lips did not move. She looked. You felt what she was thinking. Miss Marsh, a slip of a girl, looking even younger than she actually is—and she is in the teens—indulged in pantomime. Her lips moved, but she spoke not. A slight cough indicated the tuberculous taint of the character she was portraying. It was all very interesting.

For a quarter of an hour we stood by the camera just behind a tall man seated comfortably, a big brown fedora hat pulled over his eyes serving as a shade from the lights. He was talking into a megaphone. It was a mild, conversational tone. At times there would be a lull. Then again there would be advice, but the voice was not raised. So this was the man who so thoroughly inspires his players that they in turn may penetrate and stir the hearts of their audiences; who by his magnetism binds to him with hoops of steel these same players. It is a rare trait, this secret of commanding unbounded loyalty, an unusual equipment, especially in one of pronounced artistic temperament. It is a cordial handshake Mr. Griffith has for a stranger. It was early in the conversation that the writer referred to the Biograph picture, "Man's Genesis," released a year ago last July. The director said that within a few feet were two of the principals in the cast of that story. They were Miss Marsh and Robert Harron. It was the latter who had played Weakhands, but the writer had not recognized him. You are not long talking with Mr. Griffith before you realize that his chief aim is to reproduce life as it is—the avoidance of the stagey, the artificial, the affected. He said sometimes in a picture show, when a screen player was plainly overacting, he would be inclined to shudder at the remark of some enthusiast near by: "Isn't that splendid acting!" He said that successful stage artists were not necessarily good screen players. He instanced one well-known actor who had come to him for engagement, but who was only employed on an extra basis until the result of his work might be judged on the screen.

Asked as to the recent statement attributed to him about young players, Mr. Griffith smiled. "I was not quite accurately reported," he said. "What I meant was a youthful player for a youthful part. If the character calls for a girl of eighteen, I don't like to see it portrayed by a woman of thirty. When large figures are used the player is necessarily close to the camera. Then every line of the face is revealed." Mr. Griffith agreed that it is difficult if not practically impossible to fool the camera. He said that of course if a player has to indicate more than one age a resort to makeup is compulsory. Reference was made to some of the girls who have been so successful under Mr. Griffith's direction, included among others being Miss Pickford.

"Yes," said Mr. Griffith, "the public notes the successes, but it has no knowledge of the hundreds who are tried and fail to show the possession of that indefinite quality, that something in here"—as he tapped his temple—"which gives them the power to impart to others a clear realization of a given situation." Mr. Griffith told how for two years he had tried to secure a player in a certain branch of dramatics commonly supposed to be oversupplied, but had failed.

During the conversation Mr. Griffith made a statement than which none could more clearly reveal the size of the producer—his unstinted praise of work done in a studio other than his own. We had been talking of the great respect shown by experienced stage players for the remorseless camera. The writer had told how at the invitation of Producer Porter he was standing alongside the camera in the Famous Players studio when Mrs. Fiske was rehearsing a scene in "Tess of the D'Urbervilles." The great actress who in her long career had from the stage faced hundreds of thousands was, when she was preparing for the record of her work on the screen, perturbed by the interested scrutiny of but one. She intimated to Mr. Dawley her desire that there should be no audience. "By the way," we asked Mr. Griffith, "did you see the work of Mrs. Fiske in 'Tess'?"

"I did," he replied. "I think it was the most wonderful performance I ever saw on the screen—surely one of the most wonderful. It moved me and it held me, for its art and for its life."

King Baggot tells a story as to the use to which P. A. Powers, president of Warner's Features and director in the Universal, put the bright Bison nickel attached to the souvenir distributed at the Exhibitors' ball by the Universal Company. King says P. A. used it for a telephone call when he rung up Carl Laemmle to say goodnight.

It was Sam Trigger who suggested that Kate Price and Carl Laemmle be introduced together from the stage at the Exhibitors' ball when the notables were being presented. The jolly Vitagraph woman dragged out in front the president of the Universal much in the same manner she had corralled Marshall P. Wilder in a well-remembered Vitagraph comedy. The crowd was expecting something in the way of fun, and it got it in good measure. When the comedienne leaned over and planted a resounding smack on the presidential forehead there was an answering shout from the watching thousands that eclipsed in the way of noise any other effort of an evening—and morning—not exactly notable for its quietude.

Officials of the West Central Minnesota Development Association are to install moving picture projectors in every county where the organization is represented. It is designed to show pictures in the open during warm weather and in school houses in the winter. There will be shown illustrations of improved methods of agriculture, better home life methods and travels in foreign lands.

Augustus Carney, best known to picturegoers as Alkali Ike, arrived in New York on the Lusitania, December 19th. On the 22nd he started on his long trip for the Universal studios in Los Angeles, where he will be featured in comedies; the name of the brand has not yet been decided, but will probably be either Joker or Nestor. Mr. Carney was away nearly two months, and in that time visited Paris, London, and Ireland—the latter entirely, he says.

As indicative of the hold of good pictures upon even hardened film men, W. Stephen Bush tells of a recent experience in Philadelphia when in company with Mr. Greenberg, the moving picture king of Camden, N. J.; Edward M. A. Super, well-known exhibitor of Bristol, Penn., and General Manager Schwalbe, of the Philadelphia branch of the General Film Company, the question arose as to how best to spend the evening. It was decided to see the stage production of "Madame President." At the conclusion of the first act the quartet agreed that a mistake had been made in not choosing a picture show instead.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE.

Chicago Censorship to Be Tested in U. S. Court.

SUIT, attacking the validity of the film censorship ordinances of Chicago, was filed Saturday, December 20th, in the United States District Court. The complainants asked to restrain the city from enforcing it until its constitutionality shall be passed upon.

The World's Special Feature Film Company, the Mutual Film Corporation, the H. & H. Film Service, and August Zillegen are the complainants.

Unconstitutionality is alleged "by attempting to lay upon motion picture films brought into Illinois from other states and countries imports and duties under the guise of an inspection tax."

The immediate cause of the suit is the fact that the police interfered with a series of pictures at the Kedzie Theater depicting scenes from the "ritual murder" trial of Mendel Beilis, which was billed under the title, "Terrors of Russia."

Following are the eight principal arguments upon which the suit for injunction is based:

That the priviligeses and immunities granted to citizens of the United States by the Constitution, conducting business of this character, are abridged by the censorship ordinance.

That the censorship ordinance is an illegal burden upon the interstate commerce privileges granted by the United States.

That the censorship ordinance violates the spirit and genius of American institutions as set forth in the ordinance of 1787, creating the Northwest Territory.

That the censorship ordinance is in the teeth of the bill of rights as set forth in the Constitution of the State of Illinois of 1870.

That censorship and its consequent confiscation of property denies the right of trial by jury.

That the property thus taken is without compensation.

That the City Council has not the power to legislate on matters of censorship. This power is being absolutely alien to any known principle of American law.

That censorship is double taxation.

Henry J. Toner, counsel for the complainants, declares that the future of American institutions is at stake in the suit.

"If we fail," he said, Saturday night, "it will be but a short step to censorship of the press, the pulpit, the lecture platform, political conventions, educational courses, public speeches everywhere, publications of all kinds."

"I shall keep on censoring, unless I am enjoined," are the latest words of Second Deputy Funkhouser on the subject.

Prominent Chicagoan Contrasts Morality of Grand Opera and Moving Pictures.

"La Tosca" as a moving picture film made under the same moral code that guides its production for the benefit of opera-goers at the Auditorium would get a nickel show proprietor rushed to jail, in the opinion of A. A. McCormick, president of the Cook County Board.

"I am used to almost anything as a result of my year's experience on the county board, but grand opera makes me catch my breath," said Mr. McCormick recently.

"'La Tosca' would not be tolerated for one hour in 5-cent moving picture theaters.

"What I want to know is whether grand opera is to be brought up to the moral plane established for moving pictures, or will we allow the pictures to drop down to the level of grand opera. There is no question that the pictures are much cleaner.

"If a film portraying anything approaching the fervent love scene that Mary Garden and Vanni Marcoux put on amid the applause of white-gloved hands at the Auditorium appeared in a moving picture house, a patrol wagon would be backed up to the door for the loading of that proprietor and his assistants as accomplices.

"There is only one good thing about grand opera. It doesn't reach the number of people that the moving picture does. We have to be thankful that the prices make grand opera just about as nearly prohibitive as it could be," Mr. McCormick concluded.

Famous Italian Educator Praises Moving Pictures.

Dr. Maria Montessori, the world-famous Italian educator and teacher of children, gave two lectures in Chicago recently, and during the delivery of one of them she paid a glowing tribute to moving pictures.

"Children come to my schools in Rome not only from the slums, but from every class of society, and the physicians in Rome recommend my system for the nervous children," she said. "There are many schools in Rome where my method is followed—perhaps twenty—and children are taken there between the ages of two and one-half and ten. Some of the schools are in the municipality, and the city government is considering now the establishment of still more of them.

"There is no difference between the boys and girls. I am an ardent suffragist on that account.

"I use a method, not a theory. I believe in moving pictures. They have done a great deal for the cause of education, and they are used now in the schools of Rome. I made use of stereopticon pictures seventeen or eighteen years ago."

Wm. A. Brady and "Butcher-Actors."

"The theatrical business is in the ascendency, while the moving picture business, which has this year driven us to the worst theatrical season in my memory, is on the decline. There will be many failures in this line of amusement in the next eighteen months."

This prophecy was recently made by W. A. Brady, the well-known theatrical producer, in a recent interview with a Chicago Examiner reporter.

"The present year," continued Mr. Brady, "is the worst I have ever experienced in the theatrical business. The condition exists throughout the country. There is no doubt about the cause—it's the moving picture business.

"But the moving picture business has reached the pinnacle of its success, and is already on the decline. In the next eighteen months there will be many failures in this business. They are putting themselves out of business by 'overplaying' the people.

"The downfall of moving pictures will have a far-reaching effect, due to the fact that many of the investors are widows and even children.

"With the moving picture business on the decline, the theatrical business is bound to ascend. The people are tried of moving pictures, with their butcher-actors. They have been educated to better things."

The term, "butcher-actors," is just a reminder of Mr. Brady's love for pictures. It is also a reminder that Mr. Brady, in the early days, was "butcher" boy on trains running between San Francisco and Sacramento. After the "butcher" boy days he barnstormed California with a persistence that paved the way to bigger things. This is not intended as a reflection on Mr. Brady, but rather as a reminder that he once filled positions that were considerably inferior to those now held by the "butcher-actors" in moving pictures.

White Slave Film Forbidden in Chicago.

A committee of men and women witnessed an exhibition of a moving picture, entitled, "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic," shown under the direction of Major Funkhouser, deputy chief of police, Saturday, December 20th, and the women unanimously condemned it. All were agreed that the pictures contained a moral lesson which they thought would be of value, especially to girls, but rejected them on the ground that the effect upon boys might be injurious. Major Funkhouser agreed with them, and the pictures will not be shown in Chicago.

Among those present while the films were run off were: Mrs. Gertrude Howe Britton, president of the Juvenile Protective Association; Mrs. Virginia Brooks Washburn, Mrs. George M. Shirk, Mrs. Herman Landauer and Mrs. Charles G. Snow.

"The pictures would have a good effect on girls — to show them what they have to guard against," Mrs. Britton said. "Especially would the effect upon factory girls be a good one, but I think it would have a different result when shown to boys."

Mrs. Washburn agreed with Mrs. Britton.

Samuel H. London, a federal government investigator of the traffic in women, is the author of the story portrayed in motion pictures, as produced by the Moral Film Company, of New York City.

"The women were unanimously for condemning the pictures as intended to be exhibited in a theater for an admission of 25 cents, even though children under 16 years of age were to be barred," said Deputy Chief Funkhouser. "We did think that for a free public exhibition, for the purpose of moral instruction, the film might serve a good purpose."

Moving Pictures in Kansas City (Mo.) Schools.

A moving picture machine to teach the pupils geography, natural history and other subjects in the most pleasant and vivid way, was installed in Morse School, Kansas City, Mo., December 19th.

W. H. Martin, principal of the school, and several of the teachers will operate the machine for school work and also for free shows to the school patronage evenings.

"We are going to do more than merely educate and entertain the pupils with pictures," Mr. Martin said. "An attempt will be made to form their tastes for good pictures and thus make them a factor in the final eradication of the questionable pictures we find in many of the theaters."

H. H. Buckwalter's Hobbies.

H. H. Buckwalter, just returned from several months' work for the Selig company in the tropics, spent a week in Chicago looking over the developed negatives he made on the trip and visiting many of his friends in the picture business. He left for Denver, Friday, December 19th, and will spend the Christmas holidays in Colorado eating turkey every meal, and, incidentally, placing into commercial shape a new static eliminator, on which he had been working for many years, prior to last winter when it was successfully completed.

The new appliance is very small and can be put inside the case in some cameras or attached to the outside of others. The idea is entirely new, and, above all, foolproof. It has no adjustments of any kind, and the whole "works" are contained in a small box filled with cement so that should there be any tampering or "fixing" by the amateur inventor, such efforts will be immediately indicated. The apparatus was tried out last winter, not only in Colorado where the static is exceptionally bad on account of the rarefied, dry air, but also in North Dakota, where, one morning, the temperature was 37 degrees below zero.

It is not generally known that Mr. Buckwalter is the designer and inventor of several electrical and mechanical appliances which he sold to others without specifying that his name be used in connection with the articles. He has, in Denver, a private machine shop fully equipped with precision tools and in which no outside work is ever done. During his spare time—of which he has had very little for a couple of years—he works in this shop and gets recreation and pleasure from experiments that frequently end with a completed article, which is at once taken over by one of several large corporations that have a standing request for "first bid."

Chicago Film Brevities.

William A. Brady, who, in a published interview, has shown his bias against moving pictures, has been selected by Second Deputy Superintendent of Police Funkhouser as one of the members of the censor board in Chicago that sits in judgment on moving pictures. What next?

"The Adventures of Kathlyn" are just now being exploited by a syndicate of leading newspapers throughout the United States—about 52 in number, I understand. William N. The Rogers will run Famous Players subjects and special feature subjects of the General Film Company. The Rogers is a fireproof concrete building which seats 500 people. A beautiful pipe organ was installed at a cost of $5,000, and C. H. Shook, well known in the city as a pianist and a graduate of the American Conservatory of Music on the pipe organ, has been appointed organist. An admission of five and ten cents is charged.

F. J. CARROLL WILL MAKE PICTURES.

Together With C. A. Willat and William A. McManus He Has Organized the Stellar Photoplay Company.

ANNOUNCEMENT is made of the organization of the Stellar Photoplay Company, with Frank J. Carroll as president, C. A. ("Doc") Willat as vice-president, and William A. McManus as secretary and treasurer. The company will have offices in the Candler Building in Forty-second Street. The first production will be "Forgiven; or, The Jack of Diamonds," a play in which Frederick Bryton starred for years. In the pictured version the star will be Edwin F. Forsberg, a stepson of Mr. Bryton. "Forgiven" is an old-time melodrama containing, it is said, remarkable situations for screen portrayal. The play has been prepared for the screen by Bennett Musson. Mr. Carroll states that he has contracted for the rights of other plays to follow "Forgiven." A full company will leave New York probably on January 5 for St. Augustine, Fla., the location of the story.

Frank J. Carroll.

Mr. Carroll is favorably known to the film trade. He has had experience as actor and producer, his first work for the screen having been with a Western company of the Selig forces. In the producing field he has specialized in Western pictures, and is considered an authority in that division of screen work. He has traveled through Mexico, New Mexico, California, Colorado and Wyoming. It is his intention to accompany his producing companies and to exercise active supervision over the making of his pictures. Mr. Carroll has been in negotiation with well-known stars, looking to their engagement in productions to be filmed in the future. Mr. Carroll is a member of the Screen Club, and has been from its inception. He is one of the most popular members, and that is saying much. As to Mr. Willat the World has printed a great deal lately as to his wide interests in the picture business. He is a film technician and knows the manufacturing end from A to Z. Mr. McManus has had an extensive business experience. He has large real estate interests in Newark, N. J. He will have charge of the business management of the company, and will devote his time to it. Altogether, the Stellar Photoplay Company is most efficiently officered, and will begin business under unusually auspicious circumstances.

G. F. CO. POSTER DEPARTMENT AT ST. LOUIS.

The General Film Company has filled a long felt want in establishing a Poster Department at its new quarters, 3610 Olive Street, St. Louis, Missouri. This office is one of the most completely equipped in the country, and from the congratulatory letters that are coming in from the exhibitors, it will be a big success. Mr. George Balsdon, Jr., is in charge of the Poster Department, and is a real "live wire." He was formerly in charge of the Cincinnati and Pittsburgh Branches where he made a host of friends among the exhibitors.

A Chat With England's Pioneer Film Magnate. A Practical Man in Every Department of His Work.

By Hugh Hoffman.

THE British equivalent of our own Bill Swanson is Will Barker, president of Barker Motion Photography, Ltd., London. He landed in America from England last week on his sixth excursion to this country as a motion picture man. For the past thirty years he has been coming to these shores with regular frequency, but the last six trips are the only ones that count under this heading. His particular business on his present visit is the exploitation of his crowning masterpiece of film production, "Sixty Years a Queen."

Will Barker.

Mr. Barker is such a thoroughgoing Britisher that it is with much timidity we venture to say that he would have made a great American if he had been born here instead of in London. He makes no concessions to America in the matter of film production. The fact that America got the jump on England in that respect, he believes, is not because Americans have any superior ability or methods, but that English producers suffered the usual fate of the pioneer by doing the early spade work which made it easy for others to come along when the ground was broken and reap the golden harvest.

"Everything travels in cycles," says Mr. Barker. "Styles and fashions go by stampedes. The world goes along contentedly adhering to well established fancies until some new idea puts in appearance, when the old ideas are forsaken in a minute and everybody follows the new.

"That was the case in regard to British films," he went on. "The trade seems to have forgotten the fact that story pictures were first produced in England. The multiple reel originated there and we were the first to introduce the exclusive idea in service. Moreover, the first instance of a reputable legitimate theatrical star appearing in pictures was when Sir H. Beerbohm Tree accepted an offer of mine in 1908. If you think back you will remember that the early picture theaters in America depended largely upon England for their supply of new subjects.

"Then the pendulum swung to the other extreme. We had spun ourselves out. We went dry on fresh material and along came the American subjects, mostly following the lead of Mr. Griffith. The American stuff tapped a new vein that was rich and prolific. The cowboy picture was a breeze from the west that fanned the burning desire for American pictures. This craving for American stories, it seems to me, has now run its course. The mine is apparently worked out and the stuff is beginning to grow stale for lack of variety. The pendulum is swinging again to the other extreme and all indications point toward a great demand for British subjects for some years to come.

"Never before has the English branch of the trade been in such a flourishing condition. Our factories are swamped with work and new studios and factories are being rapidly built. I am doubling the capacity of my plant at Eiling and when these improvements are made we shall have a capacity of a quarter million feet of film a week, all finished by automatic process. This means that we will start the raw film through machinery that I have perfected and it will come out finished in tin boxes without a hand touching it from the beginning until the finish."

Mr. Barker is such a many sided man that it would require many pages to give an adequate description of his remarkable career. He goes back to the very beginning of cinematography and has continued as an important factor during all the developments that have ensued. He is identified with many of the important precedents that have been established in the trade and his influence in laying trade foundations has been scarcely less in our country than it has been in his own. From the beginning he has sat in council with the big men of the trade on both sides of the Atlantic.

It is doubtful if there is another film manufacturer who knows his business, from a practical standpoint, any better than does Mr. Barker. There is no stage in the making of a picture that he cannot do himself. He is a capable photographer and an expert cameraman; a mechanic, an electrician, a producer, a carpenter, a scientist, an author, a director—in fact, he is all things to all men within his own bailiwick. Aside from that he is a financier and a man of political resource.

Mr. Barker is opposed to the multiple-reel subject because he believes it will rob the picture of the very element that gave it such a vigorous hold on the hearts of the people—variety.

"If persisted in," said he, "the long picture will kill the business. The public will tire of it; with a varied program we can please the cynic, the empty head, the prude, the frivolous, and all sorts of people, but with the long subject, never. The manufacturer should be careful not to run the small exhibitor out of business, because he is the main support. Through him the business was made—yes, and even the manufacturer himself. If in the heyday of success the little fellow is forgotten and driven out the reaction will be a terrific blow to the industry."

"Over Niagara"

Real Sensations Are Distributed Through a Four-Part Melodrama by the Sterling Camera and Film Company.

By H. C. Judson.

THIS picture, which is about 3,600 feet in length, tells a story that is in itself fair though not extraordinary; but it gets an extraordinary quality as entertainment for a large majority of spectators by the snap and realism of its sensations. There are five big sensations in it, of the kind that will make the average spectator stand up and yell. He will have to do it; for they come on him suddenly with no warning at all and the producer has seen to it that they hit. Besides these, there is a larger number of lesser sensations of the kind that fill many a picture and have given fair entertainment ever since melodramas have flourished and will still please, for no one knows how many years to come. Besides these the picture gets quality from its backgrounds.

The early scenes, coming as soon as the story gets well started, are laid in New York City and are mostly street scenes with some good house-top glimpses, etc. Then the story carries to near the northern boundaries of the State. There is an actual, but romantic looking cave that seemed almost made to fill the picture's needs and finally there are the Falls themselves—they furnish the wherewithal for the last two sensations and one can hardly imagine more breathless ones. Finally, and what we have already noted implies this, the players do not stint their strength and energies in putting the story over. When there is any tussle on the screen it is a tussle. The photography is good.

The first sensation—it really is a group of sensations—comes when the secret service man whom the heroine has interested in the sad case of the hero, a young doctor unjustly serving a long term for a crime that the villain committed and who is also investigating the smuggling of Chinamen, is caught in a low dive eavesdropping and has to fight his way out. This struggle has been vigorously played and what is more, photographed so as to be effective when shown on the screen. Following this we are startled to see an automobile dash into a train. This is made effective by clever camera work. The band now captures the girl and puts her in one of the queer barrels that were used to carry the Chinamen across the river to the States and sets it with her inside, free to float down towards Niagara Falls. The hero arrives too late and, though there is a frantic attempt to save her, it is unavailing. We sadly watch the barrel approach and actually slip over the tumultuous waters. Opened later, below the Falls, the girl is found alive. The hero and the villain have been struggling on the lip of a cliff and now the villain is thrown over. We catch a glimpse of him as his body is caught in the rapids and carried over the abyss.

"CALIFORNIA" BRAND.

The California Motion Picture Corporation, whose main office is in San Francisco, announces that its product will be released in the future under the brand title "California." The company expects to specialize on feature productions. The climate of California, permitting as it does the production of moving pictures in outside settings all the year round, is particularly favorable to the best work along this line. The selection of the word "California" as a brand title for this product seems particularly suitable.

Ladies' World Contest

Popular Woman's Periodical Searching for a Motion Picture "Hero"—Ballots Coming in Rapidly.

THE first of the big magazines to capitalize the great popularity of motion pictures was the Ladies' World, published in New York by the McClure Company. Its publishers conceived the plan of running a story in the magazine which would be interpreted by a motion picture bearing the same title and appearing about the same time that the story was printed. "What Happened to Mary" was the story and the pictures were made by the Edison Company. This subject ran a year and was supplemented by another series running for six months entitled "Who Will Marry Mary." Mary Fuller was the "Mary" of the pictures that illustrated the magazine story as well as the player who took the title role in the motion pictures, and the plan was pronounced a great success.

Having scored so well in the first undertaking in this peculiar line, the publishers of the Ladies' World had a few more thinks on the subject and decided to conduct a contest. The object of the contest is this: A story was secured that promised to adapt itself to picture production. It provided a splendid part for a "hero," so the task to perform was to discover a proper hero for the part. Having a circulation of 1,300,000 and being quite well known to motion picture fans by reason of the "Mary" series, the publishers of the Ladies' World suspected that there would be a liberal response to their call for votes for the most popular of a number of players suited to assume the role selected by them.

Accordingly they chose seven of the already popular picture players among the male stars, namely, Maurice Costello, of the Vitagraph; Warren Kerrigan and King Baggot, of the Universal; Crane Wilbur, of Pathe; Arthur Johnson, of Lubin, Carlyle Blackwell, of Kalem, and Francis Bushman, of Essanay, and the voting began.

At this writing the number of ballots received total more than two hundred thousand and the standing of the contestants is in about this order: Kerrigan, Costello, Bushman, Johnson, Wilbur, Baggot, Blackwell. Ballots are coming in at the rate of ten thousand every day, but the standing of the leaders does not materially change and the difference between the first three is very small.

To promote this contest, the Ladies' World has a slide which carries the portraits of the contestants that has been distributed to several thousand exhibitors. Excellent cooperation by the exhibitors has been reported; in many instances special pictures with the "hero" particularly favored by a certain community are secured by an exhibitor and a "hero night" is advertised. Street car cards are being used with liberality and no small interest is being aroused in the contest.

Whatever may be the result of the contest the motion picture is sure to profit by the enterprise of the Ladies' World. It is a high-class publication and it will carry the glad tidings of the photoplay to many homes.

WHITE SLAVE PICTURE AT BIJOU.

On Monday, December 22nd, the Rosenbergs opened the Bijou Theater, on Broadway, New York City, with "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic," a picture in which the police have recently been very much interested. Mr. Jerome Rosenberg told a representative of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD that they expect to keep the picture there for three months. After the run is closed, the theater will be renovated throughout and a magnificent Wurlitzer organ installed, and the house will then be run as a high-class feature theater. For their Savoy Theater, on 34th Street, near Broadway, they have just bought an organ from Muller & Company, of Hagerstown, Md., at a cost of $12,000. The Savoy is the house offering the $500 prize to any patron who can prove he has seen any picture there before the day he shows it. Of course, he has only "first-day runs" and the offer is to impress that fact on the public. Six reels of Licensed offerings are shown; one and sometimes two of them are feature pictures and the rest one-reel releases. This is rather an expensive program; but they are playing to large audiences all day and in the evening, every day in the week.

RALPH INCE AS LINCOLN AGAIN.

Ralph Ince, Vitagraph player and director, will soon be seen in a portrayal of Abraham Lincoln, a character which has made him famous the world over. This Vitagraph production will show Lincoln in a new light and show a phase of his nature never before exploited. It will be released some time in the month of February.

Mr. Ince has appeared as Lincoln in "Battle Hymn of the Republic," "Lincoln's Gettysburg Address," "The Seventh Son," and "The Song Bird of the North."

Joe Brandt is Back

Universal Ambassador Returns from a Long Sojourn Abroad —Has Prospects of a Real Dinner at Home.

Joe Brandt is back!

Much is contained in that brief statement of fact. Whether it was through fear that the quality of Christmas dinner served up abroad might not be up to his liking or by reason of a knowledge born of experience that the home brand of "gauzebrust" could not be excelled is not recorded in the minutes; only the fact is on the record—Joe is back! He landed on these hospitable shores from the good ship George Washington, Monday morning, December 22, after five months of the busiest kind of hustling in England and the continet.

Notwithstanding that the hour was an early one a good party of Joe's friends were present to give him the glad hand as he stepped ashore. He managed to satisfy the customs officials that he had no diamonds concealed about his person and got through the barrier in record time, when he was taken to the Universal offices and given a regular ovation.

The writer has not had an opportunity to take stock of Joe's personal appearance since his return, but we trust to the truthfulness of the report made by George Stevenson that he brought back a fine color and that his nerves seem to be in efficient working order. It is said that Joe's sudden determination to return home was occasioned by a request to proceed to Moscow, there to establish another "Universal Weekly." His otherwise obedient nature rebelled at the prospect of so cold a Christmas as is dealt out by the Muscovites and he immediately sought the first boat bound for good old New York.

The accomplishments of Ambassador Brandt while abroad have been recorded from time to time in these columns, so we will not attempt to rehearse them, beyond noting that the Berlin office has been properly installed, as the accompanying illustration shows. In the foreground are to be seen Mr. Theodor Einstein, representative of the Imp Company (with back to reader), and at his right is Mrs. Oskar Einstein, who represents Victoria Films. Opposite her, at the typewriter, is Miss Elize Birkricht, head of the registration office; the other young lady is Miss Gertrude Ulner, at the head of the correspondence department of the Victoria Films. In the background from left to right are: Messrs. Alfred Arndt, delivery department, Imp Films; Fred Pohl, head of poster department, Victoria Films, and Charles Suess, head of projection department, Victoria Films.

J. E. ROBIN'S NIFTY CHRISTMAS CARDS.

J. E. Robin, sales manager of the Simplex machine, and Mrs. J. E. Robin are sending out to their many friends in the trade one of the niftiest little Christmas greetings that has come around. By this means the big secret is out. Hitherto Robin has been known only by the handle of "J. E." In full he is Joseph Edmond Robin.

NEW PICTURE HOUSE AT FARGO, N. D.

Charles E. McCarthy, 218 Broadway, Fargo, N. D., will open a new and up-to-date picture house in that city about January 5. The investment will aggregate $25,000, when everything is ready. The operating room will contain two Power's 6-A machines and a General Electric rectifier.

EDGAR JONES.

Accomplished Actor-Director of the Lubin Company Who Excels In Western Character Portrayal.

EDGAR JONES, actor-director of the Lubin Stock Company, is a real man of the West, but born in Steubenville, Ohio, where he spent his young manhood. He has always been devoted to sports, but his skill at horsemanship easily shows where his preference lies.

Edgar Jones.

For several years his interests lay in the field of commerce in New York, but owing to a lull in his work he accepted the advice of a friend and applied for a position as super in a revival of "Arizona" at the Academy of Music. His earnestness and the perfection of his type soon brought him an offer of something better after he had played but three performances. Edgar Selwyn, then stage manager of the production, took Jones with him to play a part in Kyrle Bellew's production of "A Gentleman of France," of which Selwyn was to be stage manager. Mr. Jones continued under the Liebler management for some years accepting, during the summer, stock engagements in various parts of the country in order that he might perfect himself. His last engagement on the stage was with Miss Viola Allen in "The Herfords." Following this, he accepted Mr. Lubin's offer to join his Western company, where his personality and gifts quickly made him conspicuous in the film drama.

His success as a leading man induced the Lubin management to promote Mr. Jones to the responsibility of directing the photoplays in which he plays the leading part. For the past few months he has been utilizing the knowledge he had gained while playing leads. His methods are peculiarly adapted to the stories assigned him to produce at Betzwood, the mammoth Lubin estate on the Schuylkill River, where he has had resources for the filming of out-of-door stories such as no other director in the East has had at his command. His wholesome personality and his manner—careless, devil-may-care—suggest the ideal hero of the far West.

FEATURE MEN ORGANIZE.

On November 20, 1913, a body of members consisting of feature film renters assembled at the office of the Advance Feature Film Co., 683 Sixth Ave., New York City, for the purpose of organizing a feature film renters association, for the purpose of improving the moving picture business in various respects, such as getting better features, and trying to improve conditions of the exhibitors in general and also to derive ways and means of protecting all feature film men from these so-called pirates.

After various debates the organization was formed and the following officers were elected: Moe Striemer, Theater Film Co., President; Murray Bier, Emby Feature Film Co., Vice-President; Wm. Weisfeld, Advance Feature Film Co., Secretary; Mr. Cohen, Feature Film Co., Treasurer.

There are enrolled 28 members with applications pending of 15 more to be taken up at the next meeting.

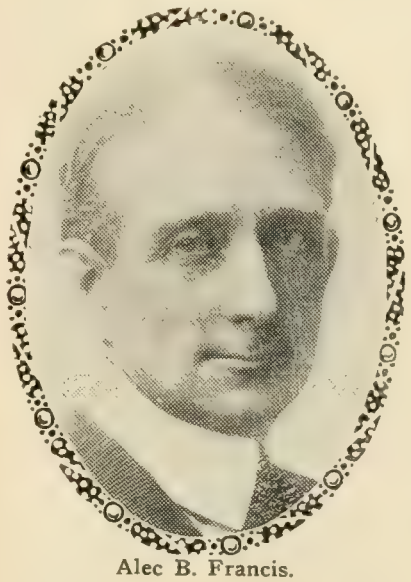
HELEN GARDNER GIVEN OVATION.

On December 19th, Miss Helen Gardner, accompanied by her director, Charles Gaskill and a number of her picture players, made a special trip from Miss Gardner's studio at Tappan-on-the-Hudson to New York as guests of Manager Rothaphel of the beautiful Regent Theater. At the conclusion of the third reel of "A Daughter of Pan," produced by Miss Gardner and Company for Warner's Features, Inc., the audience with one accord insistently applauded and kept it up until Miss Gardner graciously arose and acknowledged their appreciation of her work as a star of the silent drama.

ALEC B. FRANCIS.

The principal of this little biographical sketch, Mr. Alec B. Francis, possesses, without doubt, one of the most likable and pleasing screen personalities of any artist engaged in the work of motion pictures today.

Finely proportioned physically, with a handsome face and most charming manner, Francis is at his best when playing the leading role in society and domestic dramas. His ability as an artist is unquestioned, as he has to his credit a long period of work in legitimate, comic opera and vaudeville, both on this side of the water and in England—the latter place being his home.



Alec B. Francis.

He was a huge favorite over there in leading productions for years, and it was indeed a fortunate stroke for the exhibitor and photoplay patrons that he abandoned his first love for the silent drama, as his personality and clever work has endeared him to countless thousands throughout the United States and Canada, who nightly watch anxiously for the appearance of their favorite star in an American Eclair production.

With the versatility of the true artist, Mr. Francis is equally at home in drama and comedy, and has done some exceptionally laughable characters of the light comedy type for the Eclair Company, although his forte is straight dramatic roles.

He is happily married, takes great interest and pride in his home, which is a beautiful cottage situated near the Fort Lee studios of the Eclair Company, and his chief diversions are the purchasing of clothes of the latest mode and the running of his trim roadster, with which he travels the hills and country roads of Fort Lee, daily, going to and from his work.

His admirers and friends are numberless, as he possesses a most lovable disposition and is always the man, both off and on the screen.

WHO HAS SEEN THIS BOY?

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Van Selus, of Northfield, Minnesota, are in a state of depression owing to the disappearance from home of their son Edgar, whose portrait is published herewith. According to their solicitous letters, the young man is a highly talented musician and a skillful performer on the clarinet and violin and also plays the piano and some brass instruments. He left home after a slight difference with his parents and since that time they have been searching high and low for him. It is the opinion of Mr. and Mrs. Van Selus that their son has not gone into the band or orchestra business but that he is playing somewhere in a moving picture theater. It is evident from their letters that they are in a state of much sorrow over the disappearance of their boy, and it is suggested that anyone knowing the lad's whereabouts would make them very happy by communicating with them to Northfield, Minn., Route 3.

Edgar Van Selus.

Edgar Van Selus disappeared from home July 2, 1913. He is described as being 21 years old, fair complexion, large gray eyes, reddish brown hair, small white teeth, weight about 140, height five feet seven.

The Ernemann Camera

Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman.

BEFORE the Ernemann Company, of Germany, opened its first American branch office at 114 Fifth Avenue, New York, the Ernemann motion picture camera was well and favorably known among expert cameramen. This camera has been comparatively scarce on this side of the water for the reason that London was the nearest known selling point, but, in proportion to other European makes, the Ernemann is well represented on the firing line here in America.

With the advent of the new Ernemann branch office there are introduced some improvements in the camera which make it a far better instrument than it was a few years ago. The latest pattern of the Ernemann professional camera is known as the "Model B." It is assembled in a substantial, heavily-built teakwood case, and weighs, without the tripod, about 16 pounds. As is customary, the box is divided into independent compartments, but this case has one more compartment than is usual with the general run of cameras. On the crank side and below the customary compartment of the take-up mechanism is a space about 2 x 3 inches, extending from front to back, which is used as a finder, having a lens in front, a ground glass a few inches back, and an opening in the back for the operator to look through while grinding. All this is in addition to the regular focusing tube through the center of the case to the motion picture lens.

The intermittent movement is located in the front compartment, just under the lens. This is a very good arrangement since it allows the operator to get at his mechanism and adjust it without exposing the film. The intermittent movement is an excellent combination of friction and pin movement in alternate action. The downward pull is not obtained by eccentric rotation and claw, but by a sidewise arm and pivot action timed by a cam. The finger feed consists of two pins at the top corners of a rectangular frame. The bottom of the frame is on a hinge and the tendency is for it to pull away from the film tracks by spring arrangement. In feeding, this frame is pushed forward tightly, and the pins engage with the sprocket holes. The next movement is the downward pull with the friction shoes released. Next the friction shoes bind the film during exposure, while the pin frame releases, drops back and raises into position for the next pull.

The camera holds two magazines having a capacity of 400 feet each. The double sprocket system is used in feeding the film from one magazine to the other. There are no belts in this camera. The feed and take-up are operated by spur and bevel gears. Besides this, there is a very excellent signal if the take-up is not working. This signal consists of two small auxiliary cranks, one for each magazine, on the crank side. As the camera operates, these small cranks revolve, showing that the film is traveling all right. If one of them should stop it is a signal that the film is buckling, in which emergency the operator may turn the small crank by hand and thus get out of the difficulty.

The "Model B" is equipped with a measuring dial on the metric system. Two speeds may be had by inserting the main crank into one or the other of two slots provided for the purpose. One slot is for the regular standard speed and the other is for slow speed. The film may be run forward or backward by merely reversing the crank, no other adjustments being necessary. The "Model B" head sells for $300. The tripods are of two sizes; the two-fall ladder tripod with tilting and panoramic head sells for $72, and the three-fall ladder tripod with panorama and tilt sells for $90.

The "Model A" is a smaller camera designed for microscopic and stop-motion work. Its capacity is 200 feet of film. The take-up action is by means of spring belts and the single sprocket system is used inside. The finder is on the side on the bevel plan. Aside from these points, it is the same in general appearance and finish as "Model B." It sells for $135. Tripod with full movement, $60.

The Ernemann Company expects, by the coming spring, to have ready for the market a camera for amateur use and for use by exhibitors in taking local events.

"A WAIF OF THE PLAINS" (Warner Feature).

The famous Miller Bros. 101 Ranch in Oklahoma, the largest of its kind in the United States, furnishes the scenes for the action of "A Waif of the Plains," a story dealing with the true spirit of the West as our forefathers, the pioneers, found it. Baby Early, the talented child actress, does some remarkable riding in the "early" part of the story. She grows up into a beautiful young squaw, having been adopted by Standing Elk after the massacre of the settlers. Elsie Albert finishes the story in the same effective manner that has gained for her a warm spot in the hearts of the photoplay fans. Those who saw Miss Albert play the role of the Princess in "For the Heart of a Princess" will undoubtedly marvel at her ability to ride western horses.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE CAST OF THE DIE" (Essanay).

This Western, two-part drama is unusual inasmuch as two rats play the leading roles that are the foundation and plot of the story.

Frederick Church, a young chap from the country, secures a position in a grocery store. His employer, somewhat of a miser, keeps close watch on Fred.

From time to time the employer misses sums of money from the cash drawer and feels certain that Fred is the guilty party. The truth, however, is that the two rats have been stealing the money and making a nest of it. Fred is accused of the theft and is about to be arrested when he makes his escape. The rats, in their nibbling, get into a box of matches and set the store afire. Fred is accused and leaves town. Five years later we see Fred as a prospector in the West, married and happily so. He receives a letter from his father saying that the authorities have discovered his whereabouts and that detectives are on his trail charging him with robbery and arson. True Boardman, a notorious outlaw, wounded by the sheriff's posse, falls unconscious at Church's door. The prospector administers first aid. Fred, fearing for his own safety, shows the letter from his father to his wife.

The outlaw secures the note and places it in his pocket, dying shortly thereafter. The detectives, sheriff, and posse arrive and find the outlaw dead. Thinking the outlaw is Church, and that their mission is ended, they depart quietly from the room. Church and his wife kneel at the bedside of the outlaw, and offer a prayer of thanksgiving from saving this happy family from almost certain separation and imprisonment. This production is booked for release Friday, January 16th.

VITAGRAPH FILMS W. R. HEARST'S FAMILY.

Mrs. William R. Hearst and her three sons were filmed by the Vitagraph Company at the studios on Saturday, December the 20th. This film was especially made for Mrs. Hearst and intended for a surprise for Mr. Hearst for Xmas. There were about ten scenes made; one showing the boys playing foot ball on the lawn, several family groups, some very novel effects of animated portraits in frames and another showing the whole family in their limousine leaving the studios, biding a fond farewell to A. E. Smith and thanking him for the courtesies extended and the good time they had going through the plant, prying into the many wonders and marvels of the Vitagraph mysteries.

"THE POWER OF LIGHT" (American).

An intensely dramatic production illustrating in a forceful manner that transgression of the law is frequently not because of deliberate intent to infringe upon the rights of others but through misapplication and lack of understanding. The story provides excellent opportunity for portrayal of life and conditions in a moonshiner's camp. Sydney Ayres effectively portrays the boy, who through a mixed sense of fear and devotion, aids his father and the latter's accomplices in operating an illicit still, yet prompted by an alert inner-consciousness, resolves to seek a remedy other than through the aid of the law. His determination enables him to succeed in that he brings intellectual light to a people blinded by ignorance.

Jack Richardson does splendid work as the moonshiner and Miss Cook is commendable in her excellent interpretation of the timid subservient wife of the moonshiner and the solicitous and devoted mother of Ayres. Vivian Rich and Charlotte Burton, as rivals for the love of Ayres, lend a realistic touch.

Human interest and thrilling situations abound and the subject will undoubtedly be well received. Lorimer Johnston is the producer and Clarence J. Harris the author of the scenario.

"MADAM SATAN" (Film Releases of America).

"Madam Satan" sets the river on fire—figuratively and literally. She trains a cannon upon the side of a distant oil reservoir and shoots a nice hole through it. Then she fires a second shot—a shell. It explodes the works. The oil has poured down upon the river's bosom, and becoming ignited sets the stream ablaze from bank to bank. It's quite a sight.

A revengeful person is "Madam Satan." While her relationship to Satan is probably only nominal, her conduct quite merits her sobriquet. She has had a sinister and eventful career in which her steps upward in position and finances were not chosen to accord with recognized ethics.

She marries men mercenarily, kidnaps daughters, ties them in burning cabins and makes the lives of her enemies entirely free from monotony. Where Madam Satan is, mischief is rife. Not all her own way does she have things, however, as it happens that her opponents are not non-combatants and they are sufficiently able and militant to keep her malevolent wits working hard in an effort to destroy them and their property.

"THE LIE" (Gold Seal).

To the old Scotch father, a lie is one of the worst crimes in the category of evils. He is of the old religious school and his training has been that way. He has two children, a boy and girl. He loves them dearly, but greater than all is his abhorrence of a lie from their lips. His boy rushes into the house one day and tells the old man that his sister is suspected of murder—that if the old man will say that the girl was home an alibi can be established and thereby save her from arrest. Remember, this old man hates a lie above everything else—yet, at the same time, he loves his girl dearly. What does he do? What would you do under the same circumstances? Even if the girl were innocent of the crime, would such a lie be justified? You say yes. But, again, you haven't got this old man's point of view. You must see this play to get that.

It is a great play. There is a remarkable and unique situation. Such questions as the above flash through your mind and demand a solution as the gripping action develops. Is a lie ever justifiable? If you are a reader of the Bible you will remember the story of Abraham and Sarah when they went down into Egypt. To safeguard the honor of his wife he told the King that Sarah was his sister, and, according to resultant events, the Great God was inclined to justify him in it.

Allan Dawn, one of the Universal top-notch directors, has produced the play. It is laid in the West, and if there is a place on the green earth that Mr. Dwan is familiar with, it is the West and its people. He has made every scene ring with realism.

NEW OFFICES OF THE FILM EXCHANGE.

Very nicely situated in two large and comfortably furnished offices on the ninth floor of the new building located at 35 and 37 West 39th Street, you will find The Film Exchange, formerly housed at 64 West 14th Street. E. S. Manheimer, president of the company, though in love with the new location, was sorry that he had to move uptown, and hung on to the Fourteenth street office as long as it was possible to do business in that neighborhood. The business policy of that company will be the same as before the removal, but for the fact that business will be carried on on a larger scale, owing to the increased space and other facilities. Mr. Manheimer was fortunate in booking his three reel feature "The Great Lure of Paris," in Hammerstein's Theater for three weeks.

MOTION PICTURE INDUSTRY HONORED.

It is not generally known that over seven million people daily attend motion picture theaters, which brings to mind what an enormous task it is and has been to safeguard their lives. This is principally attained by means of proper and sufficient safety devices on the projecting machines, and it is interesting to note that a gold medal was awarded to the Nicholas Power Company, manufacturers of Power's Cameragraph No. 6A, by the American Museum of Safety, under whose auspices the First International Exposition of Safety and Sanitation was held at the Grand Central Palace, New York, December 11th to 20th, inclusive. This distinguished tribute to the mechanical genius and untiring efforts of Mr. Nicholas Power has been the occasion of much rejoicing by those who have been bending their energies to uplift the motion picture art, especially with regard to the prevention of fire and accident, and Mr. Power has been heartily congratulated.

VITAGRAPH TO HAVE BROADWAY THEATER.

On an early date of the New Year, one of the most up-to-date, handsomely equipped and accessibly located theaters on Broadway, New York, will be opened. This beautiful motion picture playhouse will be known as "The Vitagraph Theater." All the big Vitagraph Features, of five or more parts, will be shown there previous to their general release. This will give them the same test as the regular stage productions, adding to their advertising and drawing powers by reason of metropolitan indorsement and success. These Vitagraph productions will be designated as "Broadway Star Features."

KERRIGAN WINS POPULARITY CONTEST.

J. Warren Kerrigan, of the Universal, who is at present being featured in a four-reel production of Samson, has been notified that he has won first place in a popularity contest given by the Pansy Motion Picture Correspondence Club, of Buffalo, N. Y.

"THE CASE OF CHERRY PURCELLE" (Eclair).

"The Case of Cherry Purcelle," released by the Eclair Film Company on Wednesday, January 7, 1914, contains an expose of the fake wire-tapping gang, which has been but recently rounded up in New York City, and given long terms in jail. The story is by Arthur Stringer, a famous novelist and magazine writer, and carries several big punches with it. Alec Francis and Belle Adair play the leading roles of "Coke" Morgan, cocaine fiend, and Cherry Purcelle, and their work makes it a film worth while.

"THE FIRST NUGGET" (Eclair).

The Eclair Company has turned out a corking drama of the northwest in this picture. It tells the story of adventure, love and gold, and from beginning to end the interest never slackens and the action keeps the auditor keyed up to a high pitch. The most realistic and exciting scene staged in many a day is the dash of a boat containing four people through the rapids and over the giant waterfalls, where one of the men throws himself on the water forming a human anchor.

MISS WOODRUFF REMAINS WITH PATHE.

Miss Eleanor Woodruff, who it has been rumored was to leave Pathe Freres, announces that she has no such intention. It is understood that she received flattering offers from several other manufacturers but was tendered a Pathe contract that makes her one of the highest salaried stars in the moving picture business. Such a recognition of her talents is certainly gratifying to Miss Woodruff and her friends. She was born in Towanda, Pa., in 1892. Her stage experience covers four years, starting in with the Philadelphia Orpheum Stock Company where she remained for a year and a half. Then came an engagement with the Shuberts' Five Frankfurters Company at the 39th Street Theater, New York, which lasted until she accepted a flattering offer with Pathe Freres. She has never been seen on the screen in other than Pathe pictures.

GEORGE TERWILLIGER AS A DIRECTOR.

George W. Terwilliger, formerly of the Lubin scenario department, has assumed directorship, succeeding Barry O'Neil, and taking over Mr. O'Neil's company. Terwilliger, who is yet in his early thirties, is probably the youngest director in filmdom to produce special features. He is engaged on Charles Klein's "Daughters of Men," adapted for the screen by Lawrence S. McCloskey, with "The Gamblers" to follow. Terwilliger has the hearty cooperation of the entire Lubin Studio.

FIVE EXPOSURES IN ONE SCENE.

A remarkable piece of photography has been accomplished at the West Coast studios of the Universal in Francis Ford's production, "The Return of the Twins' Double." In one scene a double-exposed vision is seen in a triple exposure. In other words, five separate exposures are made on the same piece of film.

THE FILM HUSTLER.

Charlie Feature Abrams, general manager of the Great Northern Feature Film Company, is another one of the "downtowners" who has been infected with the uptown idea, and moved his cash book, ledger and stenographer to a new office in the Candler Building, 220 West 42nd Street. Besides hustling for the Great Northern Features, he is also general booster for the Laclede, Films Lloyd, and Photo Drama brands.

BLINKHORN'S "COPPERFIELD" ALL SOLD.

In less than seven weeks, Albert Blinkhorn has sold his seven part feature "David Copperfield," in every state and territory in the United States. Reports are received daily of the enthusiasm with which this production is being received throughout the country. All of Blinkhorn's releases are meeting with popular favor almost equal to that enjoyed by "Copperfield."

"SHADOWS OF THE MOULIN ROUGE" (Solax).

This story of the Paris underworld concerns the machinations of a depraved doctor and his willing confederates, two degenerate Apaches. Dr. Chevrele takes a fancy to his benefactor's wife, unknown to the latter, Mr. Henri Dupont. Dr. Chevrele manifests his admiration for Mrs. Dupont and is repulsed. Later, in revenge, he manages to secure the body of a woman of the streets who has all the facial characteristics of his friend's wife, and substitutes her for Mrs. Dupont, whom he spirits away to a low dive. When Mrs. Dupont awakens from the artificial slumber, she is lead to believe that she is a notorious Moulin Rouge habitue. When Mr. Dupont returns from a decoy trip and finds his supposed wife lifeless in her boudoir, he calls for his friend, Dr. Chevrele. The doctor pronounces her dead beyond question. While tenderly caressing the lifeless form of his wife, the husband sees several marks on the woman's hand which makes him doubt the real identity of the dead body. When he violently questions the doctor with regard to this peculiar circumstance, the doctor cunningly motions to those about that the shock has unbalanced the unfortunate young man. Immediately, the physician waylays Mr. Dupont to an insane asylum where he has him incarcerated and placed in a padded cell. The complications that ensue develop scenes of realism and the character portrayals are delineated with startling fidelity. The well-bred Mrs. Dupont, living in the unaccustomed atmosphere of the Parisian underworld, meets with many horrifying experiences and adventures. Her husband escapes from the asylum and is soon able to trace his wife through the designing efforts of the doctor. There is a mob scene in the Moulin Rouge, or the Cafe of the Red Mill, that for sensationalism will long be remembered. There are also several scenes enacted in the Cafe de la Assassin, the meeting-place of the Paris Apaches. The sewers of Paris are also brought into play, as also other underworld places.

"INTO THE WILD" (Eclair).

Melodrama has lost none of its charm for thousands of people as is exemplified by the reception of good films of this character. A thriller which cost thousands of dollars and some weeks to make is the coming Eclair feature, "Into the Wild." The action is laid in London, New York and among the Rockies, and the plot, bristling with blood-stirring incidents, exciting climaxes and pathetic situations, carries the character in rapid-moving style from place to place. The big moment of the play is the train-wrecking scene in the third reel. An overland express of five passenger cars and a mammoth locomotive, running at high speed, are thrown off the track, and the cars catch fire, creating a most awe-inspiring and wonderful scenic effect. It's a melodrama with the punch and is due for a sensational success.

SOMETHING NEW IN SLIDE INK.

In the midst of all this discussion about the practicability of writing slides with ink along comes the Thaddeus Davids Company, of New York, with an ink for that purpose which has been developed and perfected after long research and chemical experiment. Most exhibitors and operators do not need to be told of the perversity of ordinary India ink when used for writing on raw glass. The one big difficulty is that such ink spreads and will never "stay put." The Davids Company is certain that its ink overcomes this objection entirely and that exhibitors and operators may depend upon it absolutely for results without any trouble in producing them. This ink can be used with any pen and is made in six different colors, viz.: red, green, blue, violet, black and white. Attention is called to the Davids Company's advertisement in this issue.

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

LUCILLE YOUNG and Jessalyn Van Trump are the two latest addition to the new Majestic staff of leading women, raising the number to seven in all. Miss Young was formerly with the Thanhouser Company, and Miss Van Trump comes from the American Film Company.

Crane Wilbur, the popular Pathe lead, has, with six other motion picture stars, been selected by The Ladies' World as a candidate for leading honors in their contest to determine the hero of "One Wonderful Night." The Ladies' World is to spend $6,000 per month for some time on this contest, which will boost the best side of the moving picture business.

Adrienne Kroell has returned to her work as leading lady at the Selig Company, in Chicago, completely restored to health, and has started in to impress the flying film with her own fair image, as she is reckoned one of the beautiful women of the business.

The California Shriners' tour of the State has been made a feature of the two-reel "Flying A" subject, "The Shriner's Daughter," produced by Thomas Ricketts. It is a beautiful, gripping, heart-interest story taken from life. The story itself was written by Julius Frankenberg and Thomas Ricketts, and has a strong vein of human interest told in a very forceful and convincing manner.

The American Theater Curtain & Supply Company has placed a full line of equipment, including Radium Gold Fibre screens, machines and brass frames in the photoplay houses of Spbar Swift, of Winchester, Ky.; H. P. Bartram, of Frankfort, Ky., and John Kilcorn, of Rock Island, Ill.

The employees of Albert Blinkhorn's offices each received an extra week's salary for a Christmas present from their employer. This is in keeping with Blinkie's usual generosity and good-naturedness towards his employees.

The Biograph Company has installed two Simplex machines in the New York studio and one in the California studio.

"Onion Skin Sam" (Spedon), chief of the Vitagraph publicity department, is still leading the Mimeograph League with a batting average of 1,000. He alone has saved mimeographing on onion skin from becoming a lost art.

Hazel Buckham, remembered for her work in many of the best stock companies in America, has been engaged by the Universal to play ingenue leads in the Rex company of which Robert Leonard is director.

E. Mandelbaum, president of the World Special Films Corporation, has returned to Cleveland to spend the holidays with his family.

Miss Belle Bennett, new leading woman of the Balboa Company, Los Angeles, is doing excellent work with Director Bracken's company. Miss Bennett has already had an opportunity to show her ability as an actress in a difficult role. Miss Bennett will be featured in all future releases of the Balboa Company with Henry King, who will play opposite her.

Dr. Fred B. Howe, president of the Star Theater Company, of Ithaca, N. Y., and Mrs. Howe, are sending out tasty engraved cards with holiday greetings to their many friends in the business.

Bernard Loewenthal has recently purchased all the outstanding stock of the inactive stockholders in the Commercial Motion Pictures Company, and will soon be actively interested in the feature productions that this concern will produce.

C. Lang Cobb, Jr., left New York on Christmas night for St. Louis, Indianapolis and St. Paul to install booking agencies for Ramo features.

CORRESPONDENCE

LOUISVILLE.

THE twenty-six or more moving picture theaters which Louisville is supporting in such splendid style have convinced local capitalists that the field is a good one for further investment, and plans are under way for the addition to the list of houses now doing business of two more, both of which will be larger and handsomer than any now existing, if the National Theater, which is rather a vaudeville house than a motion picture house, be excluded.

The Broadway Amusement Company, which now operates a chain of six motion picture theaters in Louisville, is planning to erect the larger of the two new houses at Shelby Street and Broadway, at a cost of $150,000. It is stated that the seating capacity of the new house will be between 1,800 and 2,000. It will be erected on a site now occupied by an old theater and a residence. These will be torn down as soon as the plans are completed, and the erection of the new building will be started. The site measures about 70 by 150 feet, giving ample space for a large and handsome building. A large balcony will be a feature, which is not common in Louisville motion picture houses. Joseph & Joseph, a well-known firm of architects, are planning the theater. The other houses in Louisville controlled by the company, whose heaviest stockholders are the Steurle Brothers, are the Broadway, which will be torn down to make way for the new theater; the West Broadway, the Ideal, the Baxter, the Crown and the Royal.

If the plans of a company now being organized are successful, as there seems to be no reason to doubt they will be, another photoplay house, to cost between $100,000 and $150,000, will be built on Fourth Avenue, on a site which has not yet been selected, according to Dennis H. Long, who will probably be at the head of the company. Mr. Long was formerly resident manager of the United States Cast Iron Pipe & Foundry Company's Louisville plant, which was discontinued several months ago, and is backed by ample capital. It is understood that all the capital of the proposed company has been subscribed, and that only the completion of minor details stands between the idea and its final accomplishment. The theater, if erected, will be the largest and handsomest on Fourth Street, if not in the city.

A bill to create a commission which will have supervision over all places of amusement where children resort, including, necessarily, picture shows, may be introduced before the next Kentucky legislature, if the plans of a number of child welfare workers in the Kentucky metropolis do not go wrong. A committee called upon Mayor Buschemeyer to present the idea to him, and he took it under consideration.

M. Switow, head of the amusement company bearing his name, returned several days ago from a week's trip to Martinsville, Ind., where he attended the successful opening of the new Switow's Dream Theater. Simon Switow is spending the current week in Martinsville in charge of the theater, to see that the good start is kept up.

H. Fain, of the Louisville organization of the Kinemacolor Company, went to Helene, Ark., last week, to make a machinery installation for a house taking on the Kinemacolor service. A new Simplex machine will be used. Fred Sheldon returned recently from a trip to Jacksonville, Fla., and other points, where he closed a number of contracts for Kinemacolor machines and service. Mr. Sheldon stated that there is a strike of operators on in Birmingham, Ala., which has been in progress for some time, and that exhibitors are using non-union operators and Wurlitzer orchestras in order to keep their houses going.

Carpenter & Johnson, a Louisville firm which has met with considerable success in motion picture photography, have acquired an interior lighting plant for use in taking motion pictures of indoor scenes, and are now prepared to enter that field, which is one not ordinarily attempted by operators outside the big studios.

The growing prominence of multiple-reel subjects seems to be justified by the enthusiasm with which the better productions meet, "Over the Cliff," for example, a three-real Eclair on the Universal program, doing remarkably well last week at the Novelty.

H. B. Strube, of the Empire, will have a big Christmas tree out in front of his house for a number of days before the holiday itself, splendidly trimmed and well lighted, with Santa Claus himself in attendance giving away candy on Christmas, with copies of the Universal Weekly, a house organ published by the Universal Film Mfg. Co.

Owen Moore and Mary Pickford made a tremendous hit at the Majestic last week in the Famous Players Film Company's production of "Caprice." The Famous Players' releases have come to be very popular with Louisville theatergoers, and the announcement of one of them is always met with big attendance at the Majestic.

Charles D. Sinai, manager of the Louisville Film Supply Company, the newest of the houses in that branch of the business in Louisville, says that things are coming his way nicely, in response to vigorous work, and that when all his stock is placed he will be ready to handle business even more advantageously than at present. Out-in-the-State business is especially good with the new company.

Earl Rife, of Indianapolis, representing the World's Best Film Feature Company, was in Louisville recently. Mr. Rife was formerly with the Warner's Feature Film Company.

The Owl Feature Film Company, one of the newest of the film exchanges, is the only one in this section handling features exclusively. The company now has ninety-one features, and is doing nicely with them. Beginning with January 1 the company will open a daily service of twenty-one reels a week. The program which will be used has not yet been announced.

New houses are opening all over the South, according to a motion picture man who recently made an extensive trip through that section. Business is excellent with practically all of them, he stated, especially in towns of 10,000 or more inhabitants.

The Kentucky Motion Picture Exhibitors' League will meet in Covington, Ky., January 28 and 29, at the same time that the Ohio organization of exhibitors is in session across the river in Cincinnati. The Kentucky organization will be entertained by the Buckeye people, and Louisville members are looking forward to the finest kind of time.

The Pathe feature, "The Peerless Leader," featuring Frank Chance, made a tremendous hit at the Majestic early in the week, notwithstanding the fact that the great ballplayer's leadership was not so obviously peerless during last season as earlier in his career. The popularity of the national game doubtless had a good deal to do with the way the people flocked to see the picture, as well as the personal liking of most Americans for Chance himself.

The Kentucky Traction & Terminal Company, operating a number of electric railway lines out of Lexington, Ky., as well as the city line there, has arranged to have shown at the Colonial Theater in that city a motion picture called "The Fruits of Thoughtlessness," showing the results of carelessness on the streets. The film is a part of the company's accident-prevention campaign, and will be used wherever possible throughout the territory covered by its lines.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

OHIO.

MANAGER McDERMIT, of the Colonial Theater, Dayton, is culling the first run releases for his Sunday programs. He now has twelve solo musicians in his orchestra and is dispensing popular and classic music.

Stanley Lawrence, manager of the Mystic at Findlay, has arranged to remodel the house. Plans have been submitted to him by the Decorators' Supply Company, of Chicago, to make the theater modern in every particular, with a two and a half story arch front, illuminated by hundreds of electric lights, a screen of the latest design and a dome-shaped ticket booth. Since its start the Mystic, located on South Main Street, has enjoyed a liberal patronage. It is thought the building will be entirely remodeled and ready for occupancy by the last of January.

Manager Dougherty, of the Star Theater at Lorain, is operating to an ever increasing patronage. He had success with the "Captain Kidd" production by the 101 Bison Co.

Stewart's orchestra is playing at the Gilger Theater, Norwalk, and has quite a following.

J. M. Geier, of Chicago Junction, has purchased the Mystic Theater at Bellevue from W. DeWalt and took immediate possession. The new proprietor has had several years' experience in the motion picture industry. Mr. DeWalt has made no plans for the immediate future.

Advocates of a stricter censorship of moving picture films to safeguard children of Youngstown were heard at a meeting of the civic committee of the Chamber of Commerce, and the managers of picture theaters were also given a hearing. The committee decided to obtain a copy of the censorship law from the State Board of Censorship before taking definite action.

A new theater for East 105th Street, Cleveland, is contemplated in a deal closed recently, involving a lot frontage of eighty feet on East 105th Street and 140 feet on Kempton Avenue. The seller was Joseph Strauss, plumber, and the buyers were H. F. Heinz and E. Kohl, theatrical promoters and managers. The land, it is said, brought $100 a foot for the East 105th Street frontage. Mr. Heinz and Mr. Kohl expect to erect a two-story brick business block and theater with a seating capacity of 700.

Thieves stole the whole show from Operator McLaughlin, of the Corona Theater, at Chester recently while he was riding on a car into Wellsville. Mr. McLaughlin is in the employ of A. E. McDonald, proprietor of the Corona at Chester, and also a big moving picture house at Wellsville. Mr. McDonald had packed four reels of film in a satchel and detailed McLaughlin to ship them to his Cleveland exchange. The films were valued at $250.

C. W. Hall, agent for the American Seating Company, Chicago, recently closed a contract with the Utopia Amusement Company at Painesville for 1,000 opera chairs at $2,500.

Rev. F. W. Fraser, pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church at Massillon, is earning $20 a week for the Sunday school fund by conducting a moving picture show. He has organized the Presbyterian Sunday School Moving Picture Company, and two shows are given each week in the church auditorium. The company has bought its own apparatus and employs an expert operator. "We show pictures of the highest class and always have packed houses," says Rev. Fraser. "In a short time we will give shows more frequently and give the church funds a bigger boost."

The Corona Theater, 745 Prospect Avenue, Cleveland, one of the pioneer picture houses in the city, was sold recently to Aubrey P. Hess, of Marion, for $13,000. A lease of the theater to Mr. Hess for a term of three years was given by the Huron Square Realty Company, owners of the building the theater occupies.

The Stanley Amusement Company has been organized at Akron and incorporated in the sum of $10,000. The incorporators are E. M. Stanley, G. E. Stanley, B. E. Stanley, Marjorie Stanley and S. B. Little.

Efforts to standardize the length of programs, according to a graduated scale of admission charges, will be one of the features of the fourth annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Ohio, to be held in Cincinnati at the Sinton Hotel, January 26-29. Between 1,200 and 1,500 exhibitors are expected to attend. Standardization of programs, advocates of the plan say, means much to the theater business. They maintain it takes sixteen and a quarter minutes for a thousand feet of film to be run and that the best results in minimizing strain on the eyes and giving a clearly cut, distinct exhibition are obtained when the pictures are all run off in the same period of time. Governor Cox and former Senator Foraker will be principal speakers. There will be a banquet the night of January 28 and a ball the night of January 29. An exhibition of the latest motion picture equipment and devices will be held in connection with the convention.

Manager Chaney, of the Orpheum, Hillsboro, is more than pleased with the results he received from a long run of the "Battle of Gettysburg."

The Columbia Film Company, Columbia building, Cleveland, is making pictures in a number of Ohio towns for theater managers and industrial concerns. Manager Lustig has been in the film business for a number of years and has developed a first class producing organization.

Clay E. Brehn, Columbia building, Cleveland, who has handled a number of big film features, recently was in New York purchasing new attractions.

The Western Reserve Film Co., 712 Williamson building, has purchased from the Jungle Film Co., of New York, the Ohio rights for the famous African hunt pictures of Paul Rainey, former Clevelander and noted hunter.

Catering to a heavy holiday business the Colonial Theater, Cleveland, is presenting "Traffic in Souls."

The largest motion picture house in downtown Cleveland is planned by Joseph Grossman, 2284 East 73d Street, who has arranged to lease a building to be erected for him by the Standard Drug Co. at the rear of the O'Brien building, 813 Prospect Avenue. Architect M. B. Vorce is preparing plans for a structure which will accommodate between 700 and 800 persons. The building will be completed about April 1. Grossman was formerly proprietor of the Delmar Theater, East 71st Street and Central Avenue, and is secretary of the Cleveland Motion Picture Association.

In a new building under construction on East College Street, Oberlin, George Broadwell will conduct a motion picture theater that promises to rank with anything of the kind in northern Ohio. The auditorium is large and well ventilated, with a seating capacity of 300. Mr. Broadwell will install an absolutely fireproof booth for his machines.

The management of the Palace Theater at Steubenville ran the Red Cross film annually released and gave all the proceeds of the day's business toward the Red Cross fund.

The Fairview Amusement Company, of Cincinnati, has increased its capital from $6,000 to $12,000.

Harry Hale, manager of the Opera House at Chardon, purchased a new machine and has installed it for Christmas operation.

The Cameraphone Theater, Cleveland, is publishing a weekly bulletin of news concerning the latest releases and general notes of the industry for the benefit of regular patrons. A mailing list gives the bulletin quite a circulation. Souvenir calendars were given to patrons Christmas week.

Motion pictures were used to boom the sale of good will stock in Cleveland's community Christmas. Pictures were shown at the headquarters of the committee in charge of the community. Christmas idea and funds collected as a result?

Findlay in motion pictures was shown at the Lyceum Theater in that city recently. Pictures presented the fire department, local industries, schools and other public subjects of interest.

The Lincoln Amusement has been incorporated for a motion picture business in Cleveland, with a capital of $5,000. William Fahey, J. S. Craig, William C. Lovett, F. Duerr are incorporators.

With the close of the Schultz Theater at Zanesville, Manager W. S. Canning became lessee and manager of the Hippodrome Theater through a deal with C. W. Morrison. His first day at the Hippodrome was a distinct winner. Mr. Canning is booking first run and feature films.

The old name of "Nickelodeon" for motion picture houses at Dayton seems likely to be revived with special force and meaning as a result of the throwing down the bars to free and full competition. At a meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League recently the rule previously adopted requiring that a 10-cent price should be charged when more than three reels are shown was rescinded.

H. W. Riddle, Sr., of Ravenna has engaged J. W. Green, architect, to draw plans for a new theater to be erected in that town. It will be built to accommodate 1,000 persons. Art Lee will take a lease on the house.

The Palace Theater has been opened in the Miller building at Follansbee with entire new equipment and a booking of feature films.

Motion picture houses in Cleveland are adequately ventilated, City Chemist White reported to Health Secretary Ford, after investigating the air in the playhouses.

Charles Garner, press representative of the Priscilla Theater, Cleveland, and Bert Todd, assistant manager of the house, have announced their departure for South America. They have purchased the right of the Passion Play film and will show it in all Spanish speaking countries.

The entire receipts of one day and evening performance at the American Theater, Elyria, were recently donated to the Associated Charities to be used toward Christmas baskets for unfortunates.

A. L. Hall who has been in charge of the Family Theater at Salem for several years has announced its sale to W. R. Holden, of Wooster, who has assumed the direction of the house. Mr. Hall contemplates extended southern and eastern trips before entering another line of business.

BUCKEYE.

INDIANA.

THE Richmond, Ind., Chamber of Commerce announces that it has secured the plant of the Phantoscope Manufacturing Company to add to the list of Richmond industries. The makers of the phantoscope feel that they have a large field for their invention in the home and commercial field, the price being low enough to put it in a class with talking machines, and the size of it being such that it will pack away in a grip small enough for the traveler to carry and at a moment's notice put on a demonstration of his plant or his product. The headquarters of the company at present are at Washington, D. C. According to the Richmond Chamber of Commerce it was only the intention to keep the factory in Washington until the invention was perfected to such a point that it would not require the close personal attention of C. F. Jenkins, its inventor, and president of the company.

The Switow Amusement Company, of Louisville, Ky., which operates eight houses in Indiana, opened its latest in Martinsville, Ind., this week. The name of the new house is the Bijou Dream.

Burton Garrett has opened a booking agency in Indianapolis for Blache and Solax feature films. One of his first customers was M. Switow, who took on "A Fight for Millions" as an opener for his new house at Martinsville. Garrett is booking his stuff "first come first served," as a number of Evansville exhibitors learned this week when they came to offer a kick because a five-cent house had been given "first run" on a Blache film. The kickers were from ten-cent houses.

The semi-annual convention of the Indiana Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association at Evansville, Ind., has been postponed on account of the illness of A. C. Zaring, secretary-treasurer of the association. It will be held the third Tuesday in January instead of the first. Already the exhibitors are giving thought to the Indiana legislature to meet in January, 1915, the way they had had to hustle to head off unfriendly legislation last January still being fresh in mind. The question of a "war chest" may come up.

President J. M. Rhodes of the Indiana Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, also is an M. D. One of the official as well as professional duties devolving upon him at this time is that of attendance at the bedside of Secretary A. C. Zaring, of the association. Secretary Zaring has been ill of typhoid fever for three weeks. He will not be at his desk again before the new year has been ushered in.

The Noblesville Milling Company, Noblesville, Ind., is among those to see the value of the motion picture in advertising. The plant has been filmed recently by the M. & C. Film Company, Indianapolis, to show the plant growth, which was possible because of the fact that the original mill still stands, and is the best kind of ocular evidence of the company's prosperity. The film also shows the mill's capacity, its warehouse, addition, and a new 350,000 bushel cement tank just built. Two copies will be shown in Oregon, one in Alabama and two in the Central Western States. The film is 500 feet. C. B. Jenkins, superintendent, believes the investment a good one.

The women of the Christ Child Society, Indianapolis, have obtained the Indianapolis rights from the Empress Feature Film Company for the Kalem feature "From the Manger to the Cross" and are showing it at the Murat Theater this week to big crowds. The feature is getting extensive publicity in the local papers because of the fact that the proceeds will be used by the society for the purchase of shoes for poor children.

A building permit was taken out by the Central Amusement Company, Indianapolis, for their new house, the Isis, which is to cost $20,000. This represents the biggest investment in a film theater in the state. It is the first strictly picture house to be built with a gallery.

C. N. Stevenson asks the statement that he is the owner of the Starland, the new house to open opposite the Terminal station in Indianapolis, be withdrawn. Mr. Stevenson has taken on the burden of the work in launching the house, which is now open, but desires it to be known that C. C. Conrad is the owner. The house seats 296 and first run feature films are being used.

J. R. Eastman expects to spend $8,000 remodeling the old fire headquarters building at Indianapolis, the first floor of which will be devoted to moving pictures. The house is in unoccupied territory and should be a paying venture. The building permit was taken out this week.

J. W. Tucker, manager of the Manhattan Theater, Indianapolis, will spend $300 on changes to his Liberty Street house.

WILLIAM.

ILLINOIS.

IT is the managers of photoplay houses in Illinois who are reaping some of the benefits of the electric power mergers which are rapidly being formed throughout the state. Heretofore the manager of a picture theater in the smaller towns found it impossible to give matinee performances because the power plants were operated only after dark. With the advent of the power trust the smaller plants have been eliminated and current supplied throughout the twenty-four hours from central stations in the larger cities.

The Gem Theater, at Clinton, has been advertising in the papers of that city in order to increase its advertising slide business.

Gene Dagle has sold the Star Theater, at Murphysboro, to W. J. Tilford, proprietor of the Tilford Theater, who assumed charge December 15.

The I. A. Fosser building, at Leaf River, has been remodeled into an opera house and moving pictures will be among the attractions used.

George Kleine's "Quo Vadis?" was the attraction at the grand opening of the Pittenger Grand Theater, at Centralia.

The Industrial Moving Picture Company, of Chicago, has increased its capital stock from $2,400 to $25,000.

The Corner Theater, at Decatur, which is now under new management, has switched to the exclusive film service of the General Film Company.

The Royal Theater, at Grayville, has been leased by J. Gordon Rigall of that city. Miss Velma Singer has been engaged as pianist.

The Woman's Club, of Moline, has gone on record as favoring a censorship for moving pictures, dance halls, vaudeville houses and all other forms of amusement attractive to young people.

The Jones, Linnick & Schaefer syndicate, of Chicago, which runs a small amount of pictures, is said to have its eye on a location in Elgin for a new house.

L. E. Julian and Louis Hill, of Tuscola, have rented the Foster building in that city and will open a picture show. They will have their own electric light plant.

Manager Edward Bauch, of the Princess Theater, at Freeport, has installed new projecting apparatus.

The Bijou and Lyric Theaters, at Monmouth, are participating in a voting contest inaugurated by a newspaper in that city.

Five reels for five cents is reported as the result of a war among the managers in St. Charles. The new management of the old Star Theater is said to have reduced the price to five cents and the fight took the usual course of increasing the number of reels.

The Columbian Opera House, at Farmer City, has been leased by Johnson & Phillips, of Danville, who have opened a picture show. A free Saturday matinee marked the advent of the firm into the field.

The Pastime is the name of the new moving picture theater which has been opened at Pearl City.

Significant recognition of the place that the photoplay theater is playing in the development of Illinois cities is shown in a recent competition conducted by the junior class in architecture at the University of Illinois, at Urbana. A number of medals were awarded for artistic and utilitarian designs for modern theaters in brick and stone.

A special matinee for grade pupils was given at the Opera House, in Batavia, when "Ivanhoe" was presented. Special music was furnished by the Boys' Glee Club.

The Lawrencevill band attested to the popularity of Manager G. H. Bauer, of the Bijou, in Lawrenceville, by giving him a surprise serenade. Favors shown bands in the smaller cities are invariably appreciated.

The Star Motion Picture Company has leased the Opera House at St. Augustine, and will give exhibitions each Tuesday night. The program will include vaudeville every other week.

F. W. Zeigenheim has filed suit in the City Court at East St. Louis against the St. Clair Amusement Company, alleging that $1,500 is due him for rent of the Majestic Theater.

T. B. Henderson will resume the management of the Apollo Theater, at Princeton, the first of the year. Coincidentally he will inaugurate a picture policy which will include photoplays every night; there is no other attraction. Friday nights six acts of vaudeville will be given in addition to the pictures. New projecting apparatus and a new curtain will be installed. The Apollo will be one house in a circuit composed of La Salle, Ottawa and Kewanee. Manager Belden has not decided upon plans for the future.

Manager J. S. Quirk, of the Olympia Theater, at Arcola, recently made a number of announcements of interest to his patrons. The first was that he would start his show at 6 o'clock, the second that he thought it advisable to return to the licensed film service, and third that he had installed a new Power's machine.

It is announced that a corporation will soon assume charge of the Oak Park Theater, at Oak Park. Manager Hodson will continue in his present capacity, the plan being to allow his associates to become interested in a larger sense.

Madam Raacke, singer, has been added as an attraction at the American Theater, at East St. Louis. The place is now running five first-run films daily and has an excellent orchestra.

Turkeys were given away by the picture show management of the Murphy Opera House, at Mt. Sterling, just before Christmas.

E. B. Maurice, of Arrowsmith, has purchased the Star Theater, at Watseka, from Clyde Eastburn, who has conducted it for the last five months. Maurice has had experience in the picture business.

The American Theater, at Carthage, has been sold to Dell Hoes, formerly of Story City, Ia.

Mrs. Ralph Simpson is now owner of the moving picture show at Hopedale, having purchased it from Manager Oldham.

The Majestic, at Manhattan, has been re-opened under the management of John Hoerner.

From Grafton comes two new advocates of the moving picture show. A saloonkeeper welcomes the photoplay houses because it takes the patronage of young men who are so near their majority that it is hard for a bartender to tell whether or not they are twenty-one. The dramshop men dislike to refuse a youth whom they suspect of being under age, neither do they like to supply minors. The moving picture is a sufficient counter attraction. The postmaster says the photoplay theater has solved the problem of the early evening nuisance when the young people gather in the lobby to wait for mails and has turned this regular custom into a noisy festival.

Hedenberg & Parsons, of Meredosia, gave special Christmas day programs of religious reels. A matinee for the country patrons was an innovation for that small city.

J. W. Quinn, manager of the Majestic Theater, in Rock Island, was host, recently, to the carriers of the Davenport Daily Times, in Rock Island.

Garner & Harbison have opened a moving picture theater at Chandlerville.

Truman Hardin, of Mason City, has opened a skating rink and will give photoplays Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday nights.

The Coliseum, at Danville, is to pass out of existance as a theater after a seven-year career.

The Elite Theater, a moving picture house, has been opened in the Walker building, at Shawneetown.

William J. Kearney, of Chicago, has purchased the interest of William Padeford, also of Chicago, in the new Lyric Theater, which recently was opened in the Burton Building, at Batavia.

Miss Alzora Verton, a talented reader of Chicago, is accompanying F. E. Moore's "Hiawatha" pictures, which are being played in Illinois houses.

The East Main Street Sunday School, of Galesburg, has purchased a motion picture machine.

"A five-reel show at the Lyceum tonight. Vaudeville cut out," is the expressive advertisement of that house in Braidwood, which has had unsatisfactory experiences with "the talent."

The Lyric Theater, at Farmington, has been won over to the Universal service.

McElroy & Fitzpatrick, owners of the Lyric Theater, in Blue Island, have purchased the Grand Theater, also in that city, from Thomas Flynn, of Chicago Heights. The new owners have retained as manager of both houses Ben Snyder, who has been in charge of the Grand. The Lyric will be an exclusive picture house, while the Grand will give vaudeville and pictures.

Truant Officer Mrs. Margaret Arthur, of Joliet, reports that children are again visiting moving picture shows during school hours.

Carl Lingwall has leased the Knights of Pythias hall, at Oneida, and will conduct a moving picture show this winter.

The Majestic Theater, at Mattoon, opened December 15, featuring exclusive Universal service. Guhler's complete orchestra, a voting contest and giving away a gold watch each evening.

Baby shows have been conducted at both picture theaters in Mt. Pulaski—Dreamland and W. W. Snyder's house.

Prices did not remain advanced long in some Danville houses. A raise to ten cents for evening performances was made. The Majestic and the Luna soon reduced to five cents and the habit came in a little later with a request of only a nickel for a four-reel show.

MID-WEST SPECIAL SERVICE

NEW ENGLAND AND CANADA.

KEITH'S handsome new Imperial Theater, St. John, N. B., Can., has gone through the Christmas period with undiminished attendance, showing that the American magnates have been well supported by the Canadian people for their faith and generosity in erecting so handsome a theater in that locality. The "Battle of Waterloo," run recently, created an especially big business. Manager W. H. Golding, of the "Imperial," introduced a pretty novelty just before Christmas, and packed the house with parents and their children continually. The feature consisted of the animal burlesquers, The Four Rianos, in their funny acrobatic jungle act, with a local Santa Claus introduced in the comedy cast. Santa Claus was invited to make a few remarks from the stage, with his pack of toys, and while addressing the children, the mischievous monkeys in the act stole Santa's bag of toys, and a merry chase to recover them followed, concluding the act with some fine spectacular effects in tableaux. Manager Golding has made a distinct success of the Imperial in every way.

Arthur Allen has secured a lease on the Palace Theater, at Bangor, Me., and will operate the theater for his own account in the future. Mr. Allen is bound to make a success of the Palace, as until now he has been manager of the theater. The house has built up a remarkably fine run of trade, due to Universal film service, and able management. Mr. Allen will continue to use the Universal program and Warner features.

Fred H. Trifts, the popular manager of the busy little Gem Theater, at St. John, N. B., has returned from another New York jaunt, with a bunch of new ideas and some good bookings. Mr. Trifts is a firm believer of visiting the sources of supply personally for the sake of his programs. The result of this effort has been very good business for the Gem.

Marcus Loew's St. James Theater, Boston, offered a special feature in "Scrooge," a three-reel subject, on December 18, 19, 20. The picture, enacted by Seymour Hicks and Company, made a distinctly favorable impression.

"The Making of a Boy Scout," was the feature subject shown at Huntington Hall, Boston, this week. Among the audience were the employees of the C. F. Hovey Store, one of Boston's leading business houses, as guests of the firm. About one hundred children from the Home for Destitute Jewish Children, in Canterbury street, Dorchester, were present, at the invitation of Henry Wyner, head of the home. A large number of the employes of the Filene Company attended an exhibition of these reels. The picture appeared to interest the audiences most intensely.

Attended by former theatrical associates, the funeral of Walter J. Donovan, treasurer of the B. F. Keith enterprises, took place on December 16, in the St. Mark's Church, Ashmont, Mass., with requiem mass, officiated by Rev. John M. Farrell. The bearers were: A. Paul Keith, Robert Larsen, J. P. Gorman, D. L. Prendergast, E. P. Daily, T. J. Hill, M. E. Collins, and W. E. Collins. The burial was in Holy Cross Cemetery. Eighteen years ago, Mr. Donovan became treasurer of all the B. F. Keith enterprises in many parts of the country. His many friends mourn his death.

The Fall River Amusement Company is a recent incorporation, with $15,000 capital, and Godfrey Preister, Francis H. Bigelow and Arthur Jarvis, named as the promoters. The concern incorporated in Boston.

At Bangor, Me., the Oldtown Amusement Company filed its certificate of incorporation. The promoters are: Orman B. Fernandez, George Therrien, of Oldtown, and Hoyt W. Ingraham, of Bangor. The concern has a capital of $1,200.

Adolph Geisburg, Adolph I. Ginner and Frederick Wingersky have incorporated as the Beacon Amusement Company of Boston, with $5,000 capital. These three young men have taken over a small photoplay theater at Cliftondale, Mass., and offer a picture program.

The Star Theater, St. John (North), N. B., closed down during the pre-Christmas slump, in order to be entirely renovated. Ornamental steel walls and ceilings and an enlarged seating capacity, were among the things provided for. This little picture house is much appreciated by the people of the northern section of the maritime metropolis, mostly due to the fact that the management insists on a quality picture program.

The Elks' new home in St. John, N. B., was opened on Wednesday, December 17, with a gala function. Moving pictures proved one of the most interesting parts of the proceedings, and the St. John Elks have made permanent provision for this form of entertainment from time to time.

The Board of Selectmen, of Stonington, Conn., held their regular monthly meeting last week, and discussed at some length the matter of fees from theaters and photoplay houses. The attention of the board was called to the fact that the town law provides that places of this sort shall pay a license fee, and some sort of rate will be decided upon soon for Stonington. In some of the nearby towns larger than Stonington the license fee amounts to about one dollar a day. The figure for this town will probably be about half this rate.

The Bijou Theater, of Springfield, Mass., has broken its policy of using General film service to the exclusion of all others, and the Thanhouser Big Productions turned the trick. Recently "Robin Hood" played the Bijou to the entire satisfaction of all. The chances are that this house will now show a "mixed" service.

The Clemmer Theater at Vancouver, B. C., states that 36,580 persons paid admission to see George Kleine's "Last Days of Pompeii."

Louis Machat, manager of the Standard Feature Film Company, 665 Washington Street, Boston, has purchased the New England state rights to "The Waters of Death," a three-part Kineto feature, and also "In a Serpent's Coils," another Kineto thriller.

Philip Kaufman, general manager of the Canadian Film Company, has opened a new exchange in St. Johns, Canada, at 96 Charlotte Street.

Every effort is being made to have an Exhibitors' Ball for Boston, to be similar in every way to the one recently held in New York. In order to become posted on just how this event was held in New York, Mr. Ernest Horstman, a very widely known New England exhibitor, journeyed to New York and attended the ball. The trade in this section is bending every effort to put the stunt over, and the various exchanges have all promised to help in every possible manner.

Messrs. Adams and Gilman, managers of the Dorchester Theater, Fields Corner, Dorchester, Mass., report a steady run of trade. The owners are using the full Universal program, which pleases them very well indeed.

W. H. Patten, traveling representative of the Mutual's Boston offices, has returned from one of his frequent trips, and, as usual, annexed a couple of houses.

Manager Pearson, of the Broadway Theater at Somerville, Mass., has sold his interests in this photoplay house to John F. McKay, who has already installed a new machine and a good picture program. Mr. McKay is very enthusiastic over the prospects at the Broadway and intends to offer the best of shows.

Bangor, Me., has been a five-cent town, as far as the photoplay houses are concerned, but things bid fair to change in the not distant future. Manager Stern, of the Universal's Bangor offices, is now heading a movement to advance prices to ten cents and only one house yet remains to be convinced that it's as easy to get a dime as a nickel, provided the quality of the picture programs is sufficiently superior.

Professor DeLeon has secured the New England rights to "David Copperfield," and says that this seven-part photoplay is meeting with well deserved success in this section. The Melrose Theater, Melrose, Mass., offered "David Copperfield" on December 26.

W. V. H. Barhydt, manager of the Niagara Theater, Roxbury, Mass., has done unusually well with this house, although the original owners were unable to make the theater show much profit. The house is located on Blue Hill Avenue, and offers General Film service.

Manager William C. Smith, of the Empress Theater, St. John (West) Canada, cabled to Europe for one thousand pieces of toys, to be given away as a Christmas matinee innovation, and this trans-atlantic stroke of business was a decided hit. The toys being purchased direct from the factories of Germany were big enough and good enough for any child; and represented, according to prices on this side of the water, just three times the admission fee to the gift matinees. Manager Smith's idea was not to make money on this occasion, but to pass a compliment to the children who had been patronizing him during the year. Mr. Smith's photoplay house is a big winner.

Arrangements were made this week by the street commissioners of Boston for a public hearing on December 31, upon the proposed extension and widening of Avery Street, Boston, between Washington and Tremont Streets. In addition to extending and widening Avery Street, the street commissioners' plans provide for taking a slice off Washington Street, directly north of Avery Street, and in front of the Pastime Theater. Under these conditions, Mr. Felix Alland, of the Pastime, may decide not to continue this house.

S. Z. Poli has opened his magnificent new theater at Springfield, Mass., the details of which house have already appeared in these columns. The Young Men's Christian Association, of Springfield, has been waging a campaign to raise money toward a new building, and Mr. Poli offered to give one day's receipts toward the fund, which he guaranteed would not be less than $1,500. Now, Mr. Poli has decided to give to the fund the proceeds of the opening night, which far exceeded the $1,500 guaranteed.

M. C. Blumenberg, of the New Portland Theater, Portland, Maine, offered "Checkers" this week, and this feature pulled in a very fine trade.

"The Two Sergeants," a World Special Films feature, made good for Manager Nathan Robbins, of the Casco Theater, Portland, Me., as did "His Neighbor's Wife" this week.

The Princess Theater, Hamilton, Canada, is doing a S. R. O. business, and has decided to enlarge. The owners have purchased land and will immediately start the enlarging and remodeling. A first class theater is to be the result, with a seating capacity of over 2,000.

J. D. Murray reopened the St. George's Theater, Ottawa, Canada, on December 8. The house is greatly improved and a new machine has been installed. An eight-piece orchestra is another new feature at the St. George's, which is doing very well nowadays.

The Woonsocket, R. I., Lodge of Elks observed the annual "Lodge of Sorrow" with appropriate services at the Bijou Theater on December 7. Music and instrumental music was given.

The Hyperion Theater, New Haven, Conn., is now in the hands of the Shubert Brothers of New York, but the lease expired in the Spring of 1914. At that time the Hyperion will be taken over by S. Z. Poli, on a 10 years' lease.

Manager Ray S. Averill, of Poli's Theater, Waterbury, Conn., reports good trade, and has decided in the future to eliminate amateur night, sheriff's sale, parcel post, and similar stunts. Vaudeville and photoplays without the "extras," will be the policy from now on.

Manager Louis D. Garvey, of Fox's Theater, Waterbury, Conn., entertained William Fox on December 12 and 13. Mr. Fox is well satisfied with the results of this house.

Manager Charles Wilson, of the Garden Theater, at Waterbury, Conn., contemplates making some decided changes of policy in his house. Mr. Wilson only recently assumed control of the Garden, and has added vaudeville to the regulation photoplay programs.

Messrs. Young and Coxey have purchased the state rights of "The Boy and the Law" for Connecticut.

The new photoplay house in the old Y. M. C. A. building at Brantford, Canada, is now nearly ready. The opening should be by January 1 at the latest.

Albert Crontean, manager of the Albert Theater, Berlin, N. H., played "Escaped from the Asylum" on December 15 and 16. Business was so good with this Universal feature that Mr. Crontean decided to offer the reel again for the last three days in December.

The St. John, Canada, Evening Times showed its due appreciation of the Moving Picture World and of Manager W. H. Golding, of the Imperial Theater, that city, by reprinting in full the article written by the latter, entitled "The American Flag in Canada," which appeared in this journal. The article was considered as unprejudiced and conservative, and discussed a matter which has been agitating Western Canadian people and politicians for some time past to the extent of interesting the governments of the respective countries.

HENRY.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE property in which is located the Pickwick Moving Picture Theater at 911 Pennsylvania Avenue, Northwest, was sold last week by Samuel Maddox and others to Mrs. Ellen Goldsmith, at a price said to reach $62,000. It is said that Mrs. Goldsmith will continue the Pickwick as a moving picture house, although it is possible that she will convert it into a business property of another character. The Pickwick is one of the smallest theaters in the city, having a seating capacity of only 150. It is located right in the heart of the business center.

A new theater to be up to date in every particular is being planned for William Murphy at Thirteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, Southeast. It is to be erected on a lot 40 x 120 feet, and will have a seating capacity of about 500. Three arcaded entrances have been designed through glass doors. The exterior will be in gray brick relieved by a series of circular and dormer windows. The facade will be liberally ornamented. The structure will be surmounted by a dome roof set off by a roof in red slate.

George Kleine's "The Last Days of Pompeii" made a big hit at the Columbia Theater, one of the city's "legitimate" houses, and brought out a big attendance.

Plans and specifications are being drawn up for the erection of a one-story moving picture theater at Seventh and M Streets, Northwest, by S. R. Turner, architect, to cost in the neighborhood of $8,000.

"Personal movies" are the latest drawing-room attractions in Washington's exclusive circles, says a local paper. Not the kind of moving pictures seen in the ordinary amusement place, nor the kind used by professional lecturers to illustrate their talks. Society's "movies" are distinctly personal. For instance, the first of these used by a fashionable hostess for the entertainment of her guests visualized deep-sea fighting off the coast of Florida, and Gifford Pinchot, the former United States forester, was one of the principal figures. The picture was shown at the home of Mrs. James W. Pinchot, the famous conservationist's mother. Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, in entertaining the Secretary of War and Mrs. Garrison at dinner, a short time following Mrs. Pinchot's inauguration of the "movie" as a form of home entertainment, surprised her guests with an interesting film showing Mr. Garrison and his party viewing the Panama Canal. So great has been the success of these entertainments that numerous others of the Capital's wealthy hostesses are planning for the presentation of personal films at parties of the future. Among those said to be negotiating for pictures are Mrs. Edward McLean, Mrs. Henry F. Dimock, and Mrs. William F. Draper.

LICENSED FILM STORIES

EDISON.

THE GIRL IN THE MIDDY (Jan. 5).—Julia Gray was very tired of being grown up. Her little sister, Mabel, romped about in a sailor suit with a short skirt and had a wonderful time but because Julia was twenty-two instead of sixteen she had to be proper and staid. One day, Julia decided that she couldn't stand it any longer. She bought a sailor suit, like her sister's. One morning, she dressed herself in her new clothes and, when nobody was looking, stole off to the beach.

When Bob North came down to the dock that same morning and found a little girl who didn't look a day over fourteen, gazing wistfully at his motorboat, he naturally asked her if she wouldn't like to take a ride with him. His astonishment may be guessed when the little girl replied coldly that she certainly would not think for a moment of going on a ride with him. Bob shrugged his shoulders and pushed off from shore.

Later in the day, Julia along the shore was adrift in a boat and was, to tell the truth, in some danger. Bob happened along at a lucky moment in his motorboat and took her off. After that the little girl seemed much more disposed to be friendly, and she and Bob became very good chums.

Some time afterward, Bob went with a friend to call on the Deans. It is hardly too much to say that he was stunned when Julia came into the room, stately and magnificent, in a gleaming dress. He was also very angry at the trick she had played on him, until Julia stepped away mysteriously, and reappeared in the sailor suit. Then somehow he got over his anger.

ON THE GREAT STEEL BEAM (Jan. 6).—Lombardi was the foreman in charge of the construction work on the seventh floor of the massive office building. John Rourke, an iron worker in Lombardi's section, had on several occasions come into contact with the foreman's petty tyrannies. Rourke paid little attention to Lombardi. But one day, Lombardi stopped at the ironworker's house, and attempted to flirt with John Rourke's wife. John came to the assistance of the frightened woman, and sternly ordered the foreman off. The next day, Lombardi informed Rourke that his services were no longer required.

Before Rourke had left the building a long delayed "thunderbolt" fell on Lombardi. He had been warned several times that the company would not countenance any further infractions of their rules on his part. Therefore, when the contractors visited the building unexpectedly and found Lombardi placidly enjoying a forbidden pipe, they discharged him summarily. To Lombardi's vengeful temperament, the mere fact that he had been discharged was as nothing in comparison to the fact that Rourke was appointed foreman in his place. All his hatred toward the men who had discharged him was transferred to the account of the erstwhile inferior who had supplanted him.

The next day while the new foreman ate his lunch, a heavy sledge hammer flashed past him, missing him by a mere breath, and buried itself in the ground. The fall of the hammer was followed by a terrible shriek from above. Lombardi, in his desire for revenge, had become careless. The act of dropping the hammer had upset his balance. He had fallen, and was now hanging by his finger ends from a swinging steel beam.

In one of the most sensationally realistic scenes which have ever been attempted in pictures, we watch Rourke climb a rope to the assistance of his fast weakening enemy. Just before he reaches him, Lombardi's last finger-hold slips. He falls, but Rourke, bracing himself on the rope catches him in midair and safely brings him to the ground. The picture closes when the grateful Italian kisses the hand of his rescuer.

AFRICAN SEA BIRDS (Jan. 7).—Malagas Island, three hundred yards square, just off the southern coast of South Africa, is inhabited at a conservative estimate by some four hundred and fifty thousand birds of several species. First in order of interest come the Penguins. It will be news to many people to know that Penguins' eggs are considered a delicacy. Several hundred thousand are sent annually to the London markets.

By far the greatest part of the population of Malagas Island consists of the Solan Goose or Malagas. In all, there must be well over four hundred thousand of these beautiful birds on the little island.

Although a strong swimmer, and an expert diver, it is in the air that the Solan Goose appears to the greatest advantage. The sight of a few thousand of these great birds in flight is very beautiful.

Among the other interesting inhabitants of this city of bird life may be mentioned the colored element, the "divers" or divers, a strange cormorant like creature. Their black plumage contrasts strongly with the pure white of the Malagas. Apparently race wars are not confined to human kind, for the color line is as severely drawn on Malagas Island as aboard a Jim Crow car.

THE SHERLOCK HOLMES GIRL (Jan. 7).—Sally was the maid-of-all work at the Palace Hotel, Jonesville. Sally's rise to fame was occasioned solely because some absent-minded guest had left a book behind him, when he departed from the somewhat limited splendors of the Palace Hotel. The book was a treatise on the ancient and gentle art of detecting.

Filled with a desperate zeal to distinguish herself, Sally decided to "shadow" the very next guest who arrived in the hotel. The first guest who arrived after Sally's decision was plainly a suspicious character. To begin with, he was quietly dressed and perfectly respectable in appearance.

So Sally "shadowed" the stranger in the most approved fashion. When he locked the door of his room she looked over the transom. Sure enough he took some jewels out of his suitcase. Sally instantly summoned the police. Entering the room to keep the man under closer surveillance, she accidentally pointed a fan, shaped like a pistol at him. Instantly his hands shot above his head. The funny part of it all was that he really was the thief. Sally pocketed the reward and departed.

THE WITNESS TO THE WILL (Special—2 parts—Jan. 9).—When Major Thorndyke's illness became acute, and he felt that the end was not far off, he acted on a thought he had long held in his mind. Leaving a small income to Belden, the son whose wild ways had saddened and embittered the old man's declining years, he provided, in his will, that the bulk of his property should fall to Marjorie, his grandniece.

Shortly afterward the Major died. The search which was made for the will it was known he had drawn up was unsuccessful and the entire estate fell to Belden as the lawful heir. Shortly after his father's death, Belden asked Marjorie to marry him, but the girl refused. There was only one man in the world she loved, and that man, Lieutenant Edward Preble, U. S. N., had lately been ordered to sea. Rather than remain longer at Thorndyke Manor as a helpless dependent, she determined to seek her own living in the city. But earning her own living was not easy for the untrained girl. The end of a few months found her ill and starving in a dingy tenement house. In the kindly neighbors who came to her rescue, she recognized Terence, the Major's late groom, and his mother. Terence shocked at the pitiful case of Miss Marjorie, was filled with a sudden suspicion. He had witnessed a new will and he remembered that he had seen Belden looking at it a few days before the Major's death. So Terence went to Belden and asked him why Marjorie had been left in such poverty. Under pretense of discussing the matter, Belden lured Terence out to the old estate and pushed him over a cliff. Terence was stunned and badly bruised by the fall, but not killed. In a semi-conscious condition, he was found by Lieutenant Preble just returned from his cruise. Preble heard the man's story, and instantly went with him to confront the guilty Belden. Face to face with the man he thought he had killed, Belden lost his nerve, and with trembling hands gave Preble the will he had stolen. Preble took it to Marjorie, and a new era dawned for Thorndyke Hall.

A LONELY ROAD (Jan. 10).—When Jane and Margaret's father died, the two sisters found themselves without a cent in the world. Jane, a helplessly, inefficient girl, would soon have succumbed to the force of adverse circumstances, but Margaret was made of different stuff. So, while Jane stayed at home and wept, Margaret went out, took a position as stenographer, and supported the little family. In the course of time, Jane married. If she had married a man with even a moderately respectable salary, Margaret might have been relieved of some portion of her burden. Instead, Jane married a sallow youth with an insecure salary of fifteen dollars a week, and small prospects of advancement.

Shortly after Jane's marriage, Margaret met Edward McBride, a wealthy man whose life was devoted to the untiring pursuit of pleasure. The strength of Margaret's character, her fearlessness, her common sense, all so different from the qualities he had observed in the women of his acquaintance, aroused a keen interest in the jaded millionaire. For two weeks he showered her with attentions. Then suddenly he was called to Europe. He bade Margaret farewell, and asked her to wait for him, and the girl promised.

After McBride left, the old dreary round closed in again about Margaret. Jane's husband died, and the helpless widow was left penniless with two children to care for. To meet the necessities forced upon her, Margaret moved to a distant city, lured by the promise of more remunerative work. She wrote bright, cheerful letters to Jane, and stinted herself to send her sister the money she required.

Meanwhile McBride had turned back to the gay life from which Margaret had temporarily distracted him. At last, after ten more years of revel had gone to his wasted account, he realized, with a sudden sickening of heart, all he had missed, and resolved to go back to Margaret and try to build his life anew. On the night before he returned, Margaret, sick and faint, climbed to her dreary tenement and sat down at the dingy little table. Present and future alike were hopeless. She was too tired to work any more, and the man she loved would never come back.

In the morning when McBride and Jane came into the tenement, Margaret was still sitting at the table. So natural was her pose that for a moment they thought she was still alive.

VITAGRAPH.

FRANCINE (Jan. 5).—A young French violinist named Jacques, loves Francine, a sunny, impetuous French girl. Jacques has a chance to play in an orchestra in America, and he goes away promising to send for Francine later on. When he arrives in America he finds a room in a cheap boarding-house where Emeline, the landlady's daughter, falls in love with him, ignoring Mr. Darling for him. Wishing to become thoroughly Americanized, he lets Emeline dictate to him.

At last Jacques is able to send for Francine with her bird, a gift from Jacques; she arrives and he takes her to the boarding-house. She arouses vindictive Emeline's jealousy. When Francine innocently goes to Jacques' room, he reproves her and tells her that no good girl in America would go to a man's room. Emeline criticises all that Francine does, and Jacques, in his desire that Francine shall act as Americans do, upholds Emeline and scolds Francine. The French girl's misery is made double by the death of her bird, which she loved very much.

In despair Francine begs Jacques to marry her and to take her back to France. Jacques is willing, but Emeline interferes by coming to Francine and telling her that she is forcing herself on Jacques and that he said he shall not marry her so soon, it would be unAmerican-like. Francine decides to go to Jacques' room and then he will have to marry her to save her reputation. Jacques finds her there and is very angry. Emeline hears them talking and she comes to Jacques' room with her mother and Mr. Darling and accuses Francine of being a worthless girl. Jacques realizes what Emeline is, denounces her cunning, and takes Francine to his heart.

DIANA'S DRESS REFORM (Jan. 7).—In haste to get to the dance, Diana has trouble hooking up her dress in her maid's absence. She asks father and brother to assist her. They are deeply engrossed in a game of chess and do not wish to be disturbed. Diana stamps on the floor and insists. When they do not comply, she upsets the chess game by mixing it all up. They finally do their best to hook up Diana's dress and only succeed in breaking off most of their nails and bruising their fingers on the hooks and eyes of lovely Diana's very tight-fitting gown. When Diana returns home at an early hour, she wakes up father and brother to unhook her. She has difficulty in inducing them to get out of their warm beds. They comply when she pulls off the covers and tickles their feet.

The next morning at breakfast, Harry, Diana's brother, sees an article in the paper about women wearing Greek clothes. It strikes him that it would be a capital idea if his sister adopted the innovation; remembering that Greek clothes do not need to be hooked up. Diana thinks well of the idea, and at Mrs. Herve'e ball she appears in a loose-flowing robe. She is the belle of the evening. So popular is she that she arouses the jealousy of Mrs. Herves and the other ladies. To get even with her, Mrs. Herves plans a Greek ball, and on the day of the dance she succeeds in getting possession of Diana's Greek robe, thinking to force her to come in plain clothes. The plan is frustrated by a Greek florist, who overhears the plot and acquaints Diana with Mrs. Herves' trick. He suggests that Diana go to the ball attired in inexpensive material draped with natural flowers. She does so and is again the hit of the evening; the gypsy-like costume setting off her beauty to great advantage. The ladies look ridiculous in their Greek robes and only through Diana's kindness do they get any dances. She makes the women realize their conduct has been childish. When she goes, she mischievously leaves the Greek florist's note in which he warned her of the plot. When Mrs. Herves reads it she is vexed and chagrined.

THEIR INTEREST IN COMMON (Jan. 8).—Alice, an attractive young woman, is so pleased with the new piece of music which she composed that she must call John up at his office and make him promise to come right over to hear it. No sooner has she hung up the receiver when Count Castanni is announced and comes bounding into the room, bowing and gesticulating extravagantly. Of course Mary must play her new composition, and the Count, true to his chivalrous lineage, must twirl his pointed, epicurean mustache, and express with looks, words and gestures the rapture which her song inspires. When John arrives Mary again plays her song. But John, not having a long line of foreign grandees in his ancestral wake is more blunt and feelingless in his manner. He is perhaps a little too blunt, too feelingless, too untruthful; at least so thinks Mary, exceedingly indignant. So indignant is she that she furiously, tearfully tears up her song, and gives John back his diamond engagement ring, pointing to the door and telling him to go. John pleads to be forgiven, but Mary says haughtily, "It is better thus. We have no interest in common." Alice soon finds that the polite Count has his fallings. He does not like to go shopping, or to carry bundles, or worst of all, to play with children. He even refuses to accompany Mary to the Baby Show because, Oh horrors! it comes on the date of the death of Garibaldi. And when Alice invites some friends to hear her new composition, and detects the Count making a wry face over her music, she decides that he is a deceiver and dismisses him.

She takes up charity work among children to forget her disappointment and visits all parts of the city in her efforts to help the needy. Her excursions into the poverty-stricken districts make her a ray of sunshine among her forlorn, ragged proteges. She takes great interest in the Baby Show, and must talk to the proud mothers and pet the laughing and cry babies. Happening to look toward another part of the show she is greatly surprised at seeing John there hugging a baby. They meet; they make up, they decide that after all they have an interest in common, and happily agree that Providence has intended them for each other.

BUNNY'S MISTAKE (Jan. 9).—Though his wife is doubtful of his ability to run the new automobile, Bunny insists that he is an expert driver. He starts out alone to familiarize himself with the car. He is very proud of his ability and gets more and more daring as he progresses. As he comes down the street, little Helen, out walking with her very big doll in her arms, tries to run across the street in front of him. She becomes frightened and drops the doll. Bunny runs over the doll and thinks it is the child. Bunny comes back, but when he sees a policeman talking to men near the spot where he ran over the doll and the pavement covered with red paint, which he mistakes for blood, he becomes panic-stricken and bolts. He takes shelter in a barn. The number of his car being known, Mrs. Bunny is called on to pay for the doll during her husband's absence. Bunny is pursued by all sorts of hoodoos.

He meets policemen at every corner, farmers with shotguns and dogs. His car breaks down and he is forced to start pushing it down the road. He engages a mule team to help him. He has a fuss with the mule driver when time to pay comes and Bunny almost gets into a bad fight. Two policemen attracted by the noise come on the run and when they see Bunny they recognize him as the man who is wanted at headquarters. They do not tell him that his wife has put in a search order to find her lost husband. Bunny thinks his game is up. He holds out his hands to be handcuffed. When he arrives at police headquarters he confesses to a murder.

The captain at the desk is puzzled. It is the first he has heard of a murder. Mrs. Bunny arrives, weeping, asking for news of her recreant husband. He tells her of his awful crime. She ridicules and scolds him and tells him that he has run over a doll. The policemen enjoy a good laugh. Ever afterward when the Bunny car gets out Mrs. Bunny is at the wheel and Mr. Bunny sits meekly at her side. She wears an air of triumph and Bunny seems utterly vanquished.

LUBIN.

THE STORY THE GATE TOLD (Jan. 5).—A jealous cousin who, thwarted in her love for Jim Stewart, Dulcie's sweetheart, taunts Tom Blake, after his refusal by Dulcie that she and her favored one have been making game of him. Hearing this, Blake is enraged and picks a quarrel with Stewart who, losing patience, strikes him. This means mischief and a meeting is arranged at seven o'clock that evening. The cousin overhears the appointment, is delighted and as she is riding home meets Dulcie, who asks her the cause of her hurry. Madge, in a burst of spite, tells her of the affair and rides off. Dulcie is terrified and hastening to the place to stop the duel is just in time to be slightly wounded. Tom is frantic with fear that he has hurt her and the meeting breaks up in confusion. Dulcie, however, has only received a scratch and is soon over her fright. Tom meets her at the old gate and begs for forgiveness, which is willingly accorded. In June the wedding bells ring out for Dulcie and Stewart and the old gate witnesses a pretty sight as the pretty maids and gallant youths go forth to be married.

THE SQUIRE'S MISTAKE (Jan. 6).—Nellie Morris is struggling for an honest livelihood, handicapped by a dissolute brother. The last straw comes when the brother is arrested and Nellie determines to get as far as possible from the scenes of her old life. She sees a newspaper advertisement inserted by Squire Ruggles, a rancher, calling for a servant. She goes to the ranch and is taken into the household. Tom, the son, falls in love with Nellie. The rancher is enraged. Tom, having gained Nellie's consent to marry him, takes this inopportune time to ask his father's approval. The squire tells Tom that if he makes Nellie his wife, he must leave the home roof. Nellie persuades Tom to put off the marriage, and decides she must leave.

Monte, Nellie's brother, having escaped from jail, prowls around the neighborhood of Squire Ruggles' ranch. He sees the squire being paid a sum of money and determines to rob the house. As Nellie is leaving Monte recognizes his sister. He tells her that she must help him get the money from the house; if she refuses he will kill her. The girl consents, in order to carry out a scheme she believes will save the robbery. Leaving Monte outside, Nellie returns to the house and gets a revolver. The squire, aroused by a slight noise, looks through a crack in the door from another room. Seeing Nellie with the revolver, he believes that she is about to rob the house herself. The squire draws a bead on the girl with his revolver and is about to fire when a strange signal given by Nellie excites his curiosity. He waits to see what will happen. The brother comes into the house and Nellie immediately covers him with her revolver. Monte waits his chance and seizes the gun in Nellie's hand. While they are struggling the squire, realizing the true state of affairs, shoots, wounding Monte. Monte is taken away by the cowboys, who arrive on the scene. The squire now realizes that his estimate of Nellie was wrong. He begs the girl's forgiveness and consents to her marriage with Tom.

BETWEEN TWO FIRES (Special—2 parts—Jan. 8).—About the time that General Lee was preparing to invade the North, Alfred Archer was sent by the Federal Government into Pennsylvania to look after the secret preparations to circumvent that wily general's futher advance. He advises his old friend Applegate that as he will be in his vicinity he will call upon him and renew his suit of Cicely, Applegate's daughter. Applegate is delighted, but Cicely resents her father's desire to marry her off to Archer. Applegate in a rage tells her she shall never marry the man of her heart, Everett Kenyon, as he is a rebel.

About this time Kenyon is sent by Lee to get information regarding the country through which he intends to march. Kenyon runs across Archer and knocking him senseless, gets away with his papers. He sends Cicely a secret message to the effect that later in the evening he will throw a pebble against her bedroom window so that she may come out and meet him. Archer is taken to the Applegate home. As the guest room is not in order Applegate compels Cicely to give up her room to him. Cicely protests and Applegate locks her in the guest room to get over her temper. Archer discovers a photograph of Kenyon in the room and realizes it is the same man that stole his papers. At the same time Kenyon shows up and throws a pebble against the bedroom window to attract Cicely. Archer, seeing who it is, shoots him from the window. Kenyon is brought in unconscious and the papers recovered. Cicely is apprised of her sweetheart's condition and told to take care of him. Then Kenyon is revived, but with a resulting loss of memory.

Archer leaves to complete his mission, placing Kenyon in Applegate's care until his return, when he intends to give him over to the authorities. When he returns some weeks later he finds Ken-

It Takes a "Hallberg" to Beat a "Hallberg"

This statement is to the point and is a fact. The "HALLBERG" line of Economizers excels any other controlling devices for projection, not only in matter of efficiency as to the current consumption, but also in illuminating quality on the screen and lasting quality with low maintenance cost. There is not a day goes by which does not bring into my office and show room one or more exhibitors who wish a demonstration of the celebrated "HALLBERG" A. C. TO D. C. ECONOMIZER. When these men come in, they have generally been told by agents for various current controlling devices that so and so is the case. When I take them in my exhibition room and set before them my "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C. Economizer connected to a moving picture machine with watt meter on the line, ampere meter in series with the arc and a volt meter across the arc, and close the line switch, starting the Economizer and striking the light, they marvel at the results on the screen. They marvel still more when they see the low amount of watts taken from the line and the high amperage and powerful light delivered at the arc, but the climax comes when I show how I can put the two carbons slowly together without increasing the amperes on the generator. This is the safety valve of the "HALLBERG" system. It prevents short circuits and blowing of fuses. This is the A. C. to D.C. machine you are looking for, and I NEVER FAIL TO MAKE A SALE where I can get an opportunity to demonstrate. WRITE ABOUT IT TODAY.

I take old machines in trade as part payment for new ones and I also make liberal allowance on your old rheostats, A.C. Economizers, A.C. to D.C. converters and Rectifiers in trade for the celebrated "HALLBERG" A.C. to D.C. Economizers which give the BEST LIGHT with the LEAST CURRENT.

son recovered, but still in the dark as to who he is and what has gone before. Cicely tries to arouse the resemblance of their former love and to get him to escape, but fails. After Archer and Kenyon leave, Archer sees a better way to revenge himself on Kenyon. Without realizing what he is doing Kenyon allows Archer to enlist in his regiment and later, when the two armies meet, Kenyon is fighting side by side with Archer against his old companions in gray. At a crucial moment in the battle Kenyon gets the Confederate flag away from the flag bearer. Then his memory returns and he tears the hated blue and rebel flag clutched in hand and turns on the Yankees in an effort to help drive back their advance. One of his former fellow officers sees the action and remembering that Kenyon turned traitor and entered the Northern ranks has him captured and sent back of the lines under guard. After the battle, Archer is brought dying to the Applegate home. There he makes a clean breast of the matter and Cicely hurries off to the Confederate lines to help her lover in his extremity. Kenyon is court-martialed, but Cicely gets to the general in command just in time to get his release.

THE ENGINEER'S REVENGE (Jan. 9).—Mabel Green, the engineer's daughter, is in love with Harry, the railroad superintendent's son. The engineer, worried over financial troubles and fear of losing his home, takes several drinks on his way to work, leaving the saloon a bit unsteady. He argues with his fireman, who fears to take the engine out. The superintendent overhears their dispute and discharges the engineer. A fight ensues, in which a policeman is badly injured. The engineer is tried and is sent up for a long term. Harry, meanwhile, has done his utmost to influence his father in the engineer's behalf, but the superintendent orders him to mind his own business. When Harry begs his father to save Mabel's home, the superintendent, sick of the whole affair, threatens to cast his son off if he sees Mabel again. Harry promptly marries the girl. His mother would take Mabel to her heart, but the superintendent sternly forbids. Harry gets a position as towerman. A baby girl comes to them and they are very happy. The superintendent suffers remorse, but refuses to relent. His wife secretly visits the little family and one day is followed by her husband. There a reconciliation is effected and the superintendent hurries off to the tower to tell his son.

Meanwhile, the engineer has been released, and swears vengeance. He reads of a special trip the superintendent is to make over the road and finds he has just time to carry out a scheme of destruction. The superintendent takes Harry's wife and baby with him on the trip. There is a siding on a hill that switches down by Harry's tower on to the main track, and the engineer plans to send the empty freights on the special's track to meet and wreck it. He binds and gags Harry in the tower and throws the switch. When the engineer realizes who the tower man is he takes fiendish delight in explaining what is to happen. Harry tries to tell him of his secret marriage and that his daughter and granddaughter are on the train, but he cannot get the gag off. The engineer leaves, releases the cars and rides down on them. At the main track he jumps off. Harry has managed to get the gag loose and to silence his shouting the engineer rushes up in the tower. Harry compels him to listen and the man realizes what he has done. They rush from the tower and stop an automobile. A race begins between the motor-car and the freight cars. They get to the siding in the nick of time and throw the switch. The last freight car just passes the front of the engine and the special comes to a stop. The men and Mabel crowd from the car and Harry is made a hero. The engineer holds back, brokenhearted, until Harry draws him forward and the reconciliation is made complete.

WHEN THE DOCTORS FAILED (Jan. 10).—Mr. Jameson, desirous of spending an evening with the boys, phones his wife that he must work. She understands him from experience and induces him to first come home to supper. He leaves the boys waiting at his office, runs home, and is trapped and locked in the library. Doc, one of the number waiting, goes to investigate. Jameson throws him the key to the front door and instructs him to enter the house and make a noise like a burglar.

Mrs. Jameson, hearing the supposed burglar, quickly gives Jameson the key to the library, and the latter fires a revolver and shams being shot. Mrs. Jameson rushes for assistance, finds Doc, who at once offers aid. He explains that the situation is grave, that he needs assistance. The others waiting in the office are sent for as doctors and appear with medical satchels, which are opened, after Mrs. Jameson is sent from the room, revealing bottles of wine, cards and poker chips. Mrs. Jameson overhears hilarity and demands admittance, thereupon they all assume the gravity of doctors with a dubious case. But they perceive that Mrs. Jameson is wise and they sneak off to allow Mr. Jameson to receive his medicine from the hands of his wife.

MARRIED MEN (Jan. 10).—Mike Hogan is henpecked, his friend Clancy sympathizes with him and takes him to his house to show him how to handle a woman. After an illustrative lesson, Hogan buys a dummy on which to practice. Mrs. Hogan catches her husband beating the dummy. Surmising what he is doing, she sneaks into the house while he goes out for a drink. She changes places with the dummy and when Hogan returns to finish the beating, the dummy turns on him, beats him up, chases him out of the house and through the streets. The Clancys join in the chase. Mrs. Hogan captures her spouse and drags him back to the house. Seeing how easy it is to handle them, Mrs. Clancy "sails" into her husband and proves that she is a better woman than he is a man. Hogan is dragged into the yard and put to work at the wash tub, while Mrs. Hogan sits at the side of the tub, contentedly smoking her little dudeen.

GEORGE KLEINE.

THE HEART OF A GYPSY (Cines—2 parts—Special—Jan. 13).—Krisia Najoff, a little gypsy girl, is beaten by a drunken father. One day she looks longingly through a gate at the little orphan countess at play with her playmates. While the gypsies are in camp in the vicinity, her drunken father is driven out of the camp by his disgusted brethren. A friendship springs up between Krisia and the little countess, with a result that Krisia is adopted into the family of her little friend. Fifteen year later, Countess Olga's cousin, a handsome young man, arrives. Both girls fall in love with him and he returns Olga's affection to the intense jealousy of the former gypsy. One day they go out riding and the young man falls from his horse, sustaining minor injuries. Krisia and Olga take turns nursing him, and one day Olga enters the room and finds Krisia kissing him. At that instant Krisia, realizing her great offense, begged forgiveness.

In the days that followed, Krisia, through the medium of detective agencies, sought in vain to obtain news of her father's whereabouts. At last a letter came, saying that he was with a gypsy encampment a few miles from the villa. Krisia hastened to see him and made an engagement for him to come that night. It was the evening of the betrothal, when a dirty gypsy asked for her. He had not been in the room but a few moments when Krisia saw him steal some silver spoons, and, realizing the hopelessness of appealing to him, sent him away. After a night of despair, Krisia fled to the little stream just outside the villa's gate. From there she saw the wedding barque gaily draped with silks and flowers, and, flinging a "God bless you" after them, turned and ran toward the gypsy encampment, determined to resume the old life over again.

SELIG.

THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN—NO. 1—THE UNWELCOME THRONE (Special—3 parts—Dec. 29).—Kathlyn Hare, daughter of Col. Hare, a collector of wild animals, is modeling a pet leopard in her alfiesco studio, when her younger sister, Winnie, comes in with a collie dog, which excites the leopard into such ferocity that the sister has to seek safety in a cage. The leopard is quieted by Kathlyn and her father, and Winnie is released. The father then tells his daughters how he captured the leopard, and in a dissolve we see him arriving in the nick of time to save the King Allaha, a mythical principality in India, whose councillors had deserted him, from destruction by the infuriated beast. For his act of bravery the king gives the colonel a decoration, which he proudly displays to the girls. Six months later, just before the colonel starts for Allaha, he gives Kathlyn a large packet, upon which is written: "To be opened by my daughter, Katblyn, at midnight, December 31st." Some time afterward, as Kathlyn is showing the mysterious packet to her sister, a noise, coming from the outside, attracts their attention, and Kathlyn drops the packet as she and her sister run outside. During their absence, a Hindu, who has been lurking outside, watching the girls, steals inside, abstracts the colonel's message from the packet, but does not touch the sealed enclosure, writes a note of his own, carefully seals the envelope and vanishes.

As the old padre is ringing the church bells at midnight, on December 31, Kathlyn and her sister open the packet and find what they suppose to be the note from their father, which tells them that if he has not returned before the New Year, he is held captive by the people of Allaha, and the only way he could be saved would be by getting possession of the sealed envelope herewith. Being a woman of quick action, she takes the only way out of town that night, which is by means of a fast freight. Climbing into the caboose, she perceives one of her father's lions, boxed for shipment. The animal escapes from the cage and in the mix-up the cover of the tool chest is accidentally opened, uncovering the Hindu he is unknown to Kathlyn), who had forged the note found in the packet. He pays his fare and is accepted as a passenger. She gets to the steamer in time and in due course arrives in India, where she goes to her father's palace by way of an elephant's back. She has no sooner reached his residence when the Hindu, who has been secretly following, comes to her and tells her that her father is dead, when in reality he is held a prisoner by the people of Allaha.

Kathlyn falls into a faint, and when she regains consciousness she is told by Umbella, the Hindu, that inasmuch as the king is dead, she must become queen. In proof of his words, he opens the packet, shows her the contents of same (translating a language she cannot read), shows her the note of her father which emphatically states—to destroy the sealed packet, conferring the heriditary right to him and his successors to the throne of Allaha. A lone, defenceless woman in a strange land, she is more alarmed than ever, as she realizes that she is thoroughly in the power of fanatical people, and has already done exactly what her father commanded her not to do. She is informed that she must take possession of the throne at once, and protesting, she is dragged to the palace, placed upon the throne and held as captive against the day of the coronation. Amid great pomp, she is unwillingly crowned by the high priest. The Council then lead Umballah forward and the populace is informed that he is chosen as the husband of the queen.

ESSANAY.

HEARTS AND FLOWERS (Jan. 6).—As the result of a mistaken marriage, Mrs. Russell, broken in spirit and body, becomes ill and is ordered to the hospital by her physician. While her mother is ensconced in the hospital, her little daughter, Ruth, wanders aimlessly through the corridors and strikes up an acquaintance with Mr. Swift, a wealthy clubman, who is convalescing. The two become fast friends and Mr. Swift requests Ruth to call him Daddy. Ruth goes on errands for Mr. Swift and being liberally remunerated, she purchases flowers with which to make her mother's days brighter. Swift recovers and leaves the hospital, much to Ruth's sorrow. Not having the necessary money with which to purchase more flowers for her mother, and seeing some in an ash-can, the little girl picks them up and is bringing them to her parent when they fall to pieces. Overwhelmed with grief, she gives way to tears and is found by Swift as he is leaving his club. He purchases a large bouquet and takes it to her mother, whom he discovers is his old sweetheart—and Swift had never stopped loving her—so a happy ending is assured.

A FOOT OF ROMANCE (Jan. 7).—Jim Foley is a splendid fellow, but his huge feet, which are almost as large as his heart, are continually getting him into trouble. Jim takes his best girl, Beverly, to a dance and waltzes all over her new gown, tearing it in several different places. Beverly tells him she has had enough of him. Bob White, Jim's rival, sees a chance to win the girl's heart and asks her to accompany him to the matinee. Beverly accepts. Incriminating notes, embarrassing predicaments and clever situations keep the comedy in this story hot from beginning to end.

THE HILLS OF PEACE (Jan. 8).—Being in ill health, Fred Church goes West. Arriving there, he goes into partnership with Carl Stockdale. A few days after they strike pay dirt, Fred is taken with a paroxysm of coughing and Stockdale sends him back to the cabin to rest up. Realizing that the end is near, he writes a letter to his mother and sister, telling them he is going into the valley and not to worry if they do not hear from him, that his partner will send them his share every week. He also writes a note to Stockdale, telling him not to notify his mother and sister of his demise, as the shock would kill his mother, who is an invalid. His mother dies, and the sister goes to seek her brother. She finds her way to the cabin while Stockdale is out prospecting, and accidentally comes across the note her brother has written before he passed away. Stockdale returns and brings her to Fred's grave on the hill. In trying to comfort her in her sorrow a pretty romance springs up between them and later we see them happily married.

SNAKEVILLE'S NEW DOCTOR (Jan. 10).—In these days of women's equal rights, it is not strange to find the fair sex taking the places of men in every occupation. Women physicians are not unusual, but a really beautiful one is, and would have her hands full taking care of every lovesick swain, who would develop every known disease to have the pleasure of letting her feel his pulse or hold his head. Such was the case when Dr. J. Rawlins, physician and surgeon, came to the little Western town of Neola. Everyone from the express agent to the hangers-on round the village hotel were suddenly taken with all sorts of pains for the purpose of calling the pretty doctor to attend them. She discovers that they are all pretending to be ill, so when Harry Todd becomes sick and his wife rushes madly for the pretty doctor, she administers a large dose of castor oil, which cures him for all time. Leaving Todd's house she meets Lee Willard, who, when he sees her, promptly falls off his horse. Taking an immense knife from her satchel, she pretends she is about to amputate his leg, when he regains consciousness and rushes down the road. So when Broncho Billy gets into an argument with a Mexican and is shot, she will not attend him, thinking he is also pretending. The cowboys forcibly bring her to Broncho Billy and she saves his life. Later Broncho Billy asks her to be HIS doctor for life, and she accepts.

THE HOUR AND THE MAN (Special—2 parts—Jan. 9).—Two brothers lover her—one sincerely, he was a good man; the other loved her with a love that was lust—he was not a good man. She, not knowing, not seeing, encouraged the latter. After their marriage when the child came crying, she forgot the tender tie that bound her to the man blackguard, and thought only of the little innocent child and the forgotten duty she owed it. Timidly she asked him to right the wrong. He brought her into poverty. Yes, he listened to the whispered pleadings, but this masculinity could not hear. Then it was that the woman forgot she was a human mother and remembering only that she was a mother; her soul wandered back to the primitive ages her heart was conquered and trolled by primeval forces, and her nature became animal. The animal mother protects her young—and so this mother was about to kill the man; but he dies accidentally. And then our law accused her.

The judges appointed a lawyer to defend her, and the battle for a human soul was fought. In ringing terms the prosecution demanded her life as the forfeit of the life she was supposed to have taken, and the jury listened to the logic of the law. The attorney for the defense spoke of the little life that had created the sin—if, however, the woman was guilty—and the jury listened to a plea of humanity and maternity, and heard the silent voice of right. In summing up, the woman's lawyer consulted his watch. There in the watch was a portrait of the father of her child and the creation of this misery, the man she had loved and for whom she had suffered and sorrowed, the man who was but a man. The woman glanced at it—and with the hopeless cry of an anguished soul she fainted.

When she regained consciousness and learned that the jury had decided not to murder two lives to vindicate one, she went to the advocate of her sorrowful justice, and confessed she had learned it was his brother whom she was accused of killing, his brother who had lived a life of disgrace and with an assumed name. She knew from the picture in the watch marked "brother." The attorney is now the judge—the thirteenth juror. But in her second defense she had another and more eloquent attorney, the new-born grain of innocence. The babe offered its mute evidence and its silent plea, and obtained a second acquittal. The masterful brother took the mother of his brother's child into his arms, and the final pardon was granted.

PATHEPLAY.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 78 (Dec. 22).—Houston, Texas.—Dr. Henry Allen Tupper, special peace commissioner of the International Peace Forum, passes through here on his trip to Mexico for a conference with General Venustiano Carranza, the rebel leader.

Acheres, France.—Daring automobile drivers compete in a novel race, which tests their skill in turning in narrow quarters.

Dublin, Ireland—When a tie-up of transit is threatened by the most serious strike Ireland has experienced in a number of years, shipments of coal necessary for railroad operations are guarded by soldiers.

Texas City, Texas—The new United States automatic machine rifles, firing thirty shots with one release of the trigger, having a total capacity of four hundred shots per minute, are tested here by the army.

Leipsig, Germany.—The Kaiser and the King of Saxe attend the consecration of the church erected in memory of the Russian soldiers killed in the Battle of the Nations.

Jersey City, N. J.—A demonstration of Oxy-Acetylene Welding and Cutting Machines is made before the Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers, showing the practicability of the Emergency Equipment for the rapid cutting of steel bars.

Stafford, Texas.—The flood situation receives the personal attention of Governor O. B. Colquitt, who, accompanied by his staff, visits the relief camps with a view to alleviating the suffering of the flood victims.

Florence, Italy—The search for Mona Lisa, the famous painting by Leonardo Da Vinci, which was stolen from the Louvre in 1911, ends in its recovery. The treasure is regarded as priceless, $5,000,000 having been refused for its purchase, and no theft in the history of art has so aroused the entire civilized world.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 79 (Dec. 25).—Galveston, Texas—The Walter B. Colquitt memorial hospital for tubercular children, costing $40,000, raised entirely through the sale of Red Cross stamps, will afford much needed relief to victims of the White Plague.

Buc, France—The intrepid English airman, B. C. Hucks, gives a marvelous exhibition of looping the loop and flying upside down.

Chicago, Ill.—Roller skate mail and parcel post delivery, a proposed new method for expediting delivery of mail matter in this city, is severely tested.

WHOM GOD HATH JOINED (Jan. 6).—Tom Weston, an Easterner, has married in secret a Western girl while he is stopping on a ranch in the West. He does not want to have his father know of the step he has taken for fear of being disinherited and lives apart from his wife. Irene writes him that the woman who is taking care of their baby refuses to do so any longer and that she feels that the marriage should be publicly announced. Tom writes his wife, forbidding her to reveal the marriage and asks her to meet him that night. In the meanwhile, he secretly enters the house of the minister who married them and tears from the record of marriages the sheet which registers his own.

It so happens that during the day a dead Indian brave has been cremated according to tribal custom at the very spot where Tom is to meet his wife. Tom plans to return East and shirk his responsibility as husband and father. The couple meet and in the presence of his wife Tom destroys the evidence of the marriage and leaves her, as he thinks, for good. The deserted woman with her baby is befriended by a band of gypsies, who take her in. The torn marriage record and Tom's letter is found by chance near the scattered bones of the Indian's cremation and the community believes that Tom has murdered Irene, who is missing. He is arrested at the station and thrown into jail. Irene hears of his arrest and rides to the jail in time to prevent a lynching. Shamed into repentance Tom writes his father, tells of his marriage and determines to make his own way.

DISHING DICK'S DISHWASHER (Jan. 7).—Their demand for paper plates being refused the members of Dishwashers' Union No. 23 go on strike and the chef of the summer hotel finds himself face to face with a heart-breaking problem. While he is deliberating on the best course to pursue three tramps with huge appetites, but small inclination for work, arrive upon the scene and see upon the kitchen door the sign "Dishwashers Wanted." Learning of the straits in which the chef is placed the flame of genius flares up in Dick and he leads his companions away to get their aid in perfecting his plans.

The next day he calls upon the chef and before he can be thrown out has told him that he has invented a machine which will wash dishes cleanly, quickly and automatically and that he will sell it for a thousand dollars. The chef offers to give it a trial and the machine (the result of real labor upon the part of the tramps) is delivered to the hotel kitchen. Dick feeds dirty plates into a slot in the end and into the rack at the other end comes out clean dishes. The delighted chef gives to Dick a check for a thousand dollars.

The next day dirty dishes are brought to the machine from all around. For a while it works beautifully, but suddenly stops. The chef's dog which has been sniffing around crawls into it. There comes a racket from the interior, the side falls out and there is disclosed Dick's two hobo friends, who have been doing the dishwashing.

SNOW EFFECTS IN AUSTRIA (Jan. 7).—A beautiful scenic showing Austria in its winter coat. For nearly half of the year a large part of that country is covered with heavy snows.

THE WARDS OF SOCIETY (Special—2 parts—Jan. 8).—This film shows the reasons underlying much of modern crime and gives the life history of three boys born of degenerate fathers, one of whom is a drunkard and the other a drug fiend. Because of this faulty parentage the boys are defective mentally, but not so much so as to be very evident. Owing to their environment they take to petty crimes and are brought before the Children's Court. They are then sent to physicians and psychologists to be examined by the Binet and other tests. Social workers visit their homes and on the strength of the reports are sent to Randall's Island to the School for Defective Children. Interesting views of the various activities of Randall's Island are given showing the intelligent supervision to which the boys are subjected.

A year later the parents of Frank and John exercise their rights to take their children home, which they do contrary to the advice of the physician in charge. Tom is forced to remain, since his father has died, due to an overdose of morphine. Frank, owing to his weak mentality, is easily influenced and falls prey to certain criminals. He is instigated to robbery and murder by these persons and pays the penalty for his crime by being sentenced to the electric chair. His brother John commits arson and has the good fortune to be defended by a lawyer who has studied sociology and knows that the young man is irresponsible. He traces his life history, produces the early record of the Children's Court reports together with one from the Clearing House for Mental Defectices. On the strength of these reports John is committed to Randall's Island, this time permanently. In the meantime, Tom has grown to manhood on the island and unable to do himself or society an injury passes a peaceful and happy existence.

SATAN'S CASTLE

A shepherd, answering the question of some tourists why the ruined castle near which they were standing was named "SATAN'S CASTLE," tells them the story on the screen. "A wicked gambler in the days of long ago, having lost all his possessions, made a bargain with Satan to enjoy all this world's glories and after that be the servant of the devil. He was made Baron and lord of the castle, and became the dominator of the people for miles around. The peasants grew tired of the oppression and assaulted the castle by escalading a dangerously steep wall. They overpowered the bodyguard, saved the daughter of one of the peasants from the clutches of the wicked Baron and left him to burn in the castle, while Satan appeared to claim his debt."

The answer is apparent to every one who sees the film that the best way is to prevent crime that society may not suffer from it at the hands of mental defectives; that punishment after the crime as in the case of Frank is locking the barn door after the horse is stolen; that in the case of John the permanent committment to Randall's Island came only after great damage had been done; that in the case of Tom the right and only method of handling such individuals was followed.

A RAMBLE IN PONDICHERY, INDIA (Jan. 8).—A beautiful scenic, showing a remarkable city with snowy temples, fine residences, luxuriant tropical foliage, splendid drives and a fine ocean front.

THE MINISTER'S DAUGHTER (Special—2 parts—Jan. 10).—Clare Bradley, the daughter of a minister, receives a letter from Jack Langdon stating that he is to return to his parents' home on the estate adjoining the rectory. Clare is overjoyed when her old playmate, now a young man, appears and together they visit favorite haunts on the old grounds and in a room dissolve into those of children and back to the adult characters of Clare and Jack. The young man fulfills the promise of his boyhood by asking the minister's daughter to marry him. She accepts him and following this a love scene in the garden is witnessed by a servant in Jack's household, who hurries to tell his mother. Mrs. Langdon wants her son to marry his cousin Dora and to prevent the growth of the love affair she disapproves of, invites Dora to visit them. Clare's father, who has watched the lovers from a window, warns the girl not to think of Jack as a possible husband. Dora soon succeeds in winning her cousin's love and Clare, guessing the truth, is miserable. When she sees her rival in Jack's arms she gives way under the strain of several weeks' unhappiness and is carried unconscious to her room, where she is confined with a serious attack of brain fever. Meanwhile, the engagement of Jack and Dora has been formally announced and Clare's father is asked to perform the marriage ceremony. The minister's daughter receives her strength sufficiently to follow the wedding party to the church and she is seen on a balcony while her father marries Jack and Dora. The intense misery she experiences is depicted in her face and by her actions and before the service has been read an uncontrollable cry attracts the attention of those below. The minister bravely continues until the pair have been pronounced man and wife and then hurries to his broken-hearted daughter, who dies in his arms.

KALEM.

A SHOT IN THE NIGHT (Special—2 parts—Jan. 5).—George, the ten year-old son of Roger Trent, stormily protests against his father's second marriage. Father and son are passionately attached to each other. After the marriage George makes no attempt to conceal his hatred for Laura, his stepmother. After several attempts to conciliate the boy, Mrs. Trent resolves to repay him in his own coin. Trent, torn between his love for the two, views the situation with apprehension. A series of burglaries in the neighborhood fill Laura with alarm. That night Trent is called out of town. In packing his valise the man forgets his revolver, which he leaves lying on the dresser. Laura and George retire immediately after his departure. Trent meets Doctor Blake, with whom he is to make the trip, at the station. The man learns that he has forgotten some important documents. Requesting Blake to wait for him, Trent hastens home. In entering the house he accidently knocks over a statuette.

Laura and George awake with a start. George runs into his step-mother's room and clings to her in terror. Trent remembers that the papers are in his room. He quietly ascends the stairs. Laura hears stealthy footsteps approaching. In terror, the woman shrinks against the dresser, her hand touches the pistol. Seizing the weapon, Laura levels it at the door. Trent slowly opens it. A shot rings out. The husband falls with a cry. Doctor Blake becomes worried when Trent fails to return. The man hastens to the house. He finds Laura and George frantically endeavoring to revive Trent. Blake orders the two from the room. Mother and step-son wait outside while the one whom they love battles with death. During this fearful period arises the bond of sympathy and love which wipes away all barriers of hatred and distrust.

HER HUSBAND'S FRIEND (Special—2 parts—Jan. 7).—Believing her husband no longer loves her, Alice Lund consents to elope with Cater. She writes the man a note to this effect. Dane and the Lunds are warm friends. He decides to surprise them by taking them to the theater. Dane calls at the Lund home in time to see Alice preparing to run away with Cater. He sees the woman rifle her husbands safe of a large sum of money. She is just about to hand it to Cater, when Dane steps between and seizes the money. He orders Cater from the house. Alice perceives sorrow of the step she contemplated. In gratitude, the woman embraces Dane. Lund enters in time to witness the act. Fearing lest Dane betray her secret, Alice decides to disgrace him. The woman tells her husband that she had caught Dane in the act of robbing the safe and was pleading with him to return the money.

Dane realizes the motives which prompted Alice to tell the outrageous falsehood. He remains silent when Lund, unwilling to believe the story, pleads for his side of the matter. Dane is ordered from the house. In need of money, Cater determines to blackmail Alice by threatening to show Lund the note in which she had consented to elope with him. Terror-stricken, Alice is an easy victim. In desperation, the woman decides to plead with Dane to get the note from Cater. Despite the wrong he has suffered at her hands, Dane listens to her plea. Later, he chokes Cater into submission and gets the incriminating missive. The blackmailer sees him depart for the Lund home. He tells Lund that Dane has a tryst with Alice. Filled with rage, Lund hastens home, accompanied by Cater. This time, however, Alice rises to the occasion when Lund faces Dane. The woman confesses the whole miserable story and exposes Cater's villainy. The blackmailer shrivels beneath Lund's scorn and slinks from the house. Dane's nobility overwhelms Lund, and he begs forgiveness. Dane smiles, places his friend's hand into that of Alice, and quietly withdraws.

THE JOKE ON JANE (Jan. 9).—There is no doubt as to the ruler of the Davis home. Catching her husband smoking against her orders, Jane wields a broom with such effect that Davis flees out of the house. Doctor Smith witnesses the incident. He and the henpecked husband devise a scheme to fool Jane. After wadding through a mudpuddle, Davis walks back into the house. His wife takes one look at the mud-tracked floor, and then brings the broom down upon her luckless husband's head. Davis falls, apparently unconscious. Doctor Smith is summoned and declares that when the man recovers he will have lost his identity. He warns Jane to give Davis his own way in everything.

Ensues a period of bliss for Davis, who for the first time is the boss of his own home. In looking over a newspaper, Jane discovers an item which tells of a man who had recovered his memory following a blow on the head. She hires a gangster to assault her husband. Davis, however, proves more than a match for the gangster, who is badly beaten and then placed under arrest. Jane is also arrested as an accomplice. Pretending that his mind is restored, Davis goes to the police station. Jane is badly scared when her husband sternly declares his intention of allowing her to languish in jail. Not until she promises faithfully to allow him to rule their roost, does Davis relent.

MAKING CUT GLASS (Jan. 9).—Many and delicate are the operations undergone by a piece of cut glass before its sparkle and brilliancy delight the heart of its owner. No industry demands a greater degree of skill of the men engaged in it than that of making cut glass.

This wonderful feature shows every detail of manufacture from shaping of the molten mass of crystal to the last loving touch of the polisher. The observer follows the shaped piece into the hands of the designer, then sees the pattern roughly cut by grindstones moistened with sand, after which the succeeding operations are witnessed until the finished piece stands in all its iridescent beauty.

THE CASE OF CHERRY PURCELLE (3 parts—Jan. 7).—"Coke" Morgan, a hopeless cocaine fiend with a brilliant but crooked mind, evolves a clever plan of wire tapping to separate the unwary from their money. The scene is set for a killing and they cast about for a fascinating woman who can work outside to lure the fool and his money. "Camera eye" Sherman, a noted detective, is keeping close watch on the band of wire tappers, but has little evidence against them. Anna is greatly devoted to "Coke" and falls in love with him. Cherry Purcelle has searched for a position until she is desperate and almost starving. Returning home, she becomes faint and is carried inside by the kind-hearted "Coke," who ministers to her at the same time becoming deely smitten with her charms. She is just the type of woman for the wire tappers' purpose, and, pressed by necessity, she consents to act as a "capper" for them. Anna is extremely jealous of the girl.

To try out their game, Cherry lures a wealthy young society man into the den. He falls, and loses a heavy sum of money. Delighted at the girl's success, "Coke" insists that she now dress herself for the big game. To his amazement she draws from her trunk the most beautiful gowns imaginable and upon being questioned by him, relates how her wonderful cleverness had secured those gowns for her.

Strangely enough, Kerrfoot, the millionaire who had invited Cherry to a party sometime ago, is the man the wire tapping gang are most anxious to get. Sherman searches for evidence to connect Cherry with the band of crooks. She is installed in a luxurious apartment, for which the money has been gotten from contributions from members of the gang. Sherman traces Cherry to her new rooms, but is completely baffled by the girl's cleverness as she eludes him at every turn. One night, she and "Coke" are dining in a well-known restaurant when Kerrfoot enters and sees her. Still greatly in love he sends in a note and she meets him in the foyer, for the purpose of luring him into the trap. Sherman breaks into the den at night and discovers evidence enough to convict the bunch. He follows Cherry to her apartments and tells her he will round them all up within the week. She receives a letter stating that the gang will call that night and she is to have Kerrfoot there. "Coke" commands her to phone the millionaire, but she refuses. At the point of revolver she is forced to the phone, where she asks him to call on her. He says he is leaving on his yacht for Europe that night at ten o'clock. "Coke" has a plan. He goes to the pier and pretends to commit suicide. Kerrfoot who has just arrived becomes interested and follows him to his room, where the cocaine fiend tells him that he has lost thirty thousand dollars to a band of wire tappers led by Cherry Purcelle. Kerrfoot's love seems killed and he leaves to denounce the girl. Meanwhile, Cherry has written him a note stating that she is tired of being hounded and is ready to marry him if he will have her, having kept clean through all her experiences. The note is given to the faithful Anna, who brings it to "Coke" instead, who is waiting in the den with the bunch. Kerrfoot calls on Cherry and she explains the identity of Morgan. Meanwhile Morgan, mad with jealousy and rage, rushes to Cherry's rooms and intercepts the two lovers as they are about to make off. He draws his pistol—there is a sharp struggle and Morgan falls to the floor wounded. With one glance at his form, Cherry departs with her millionaire lover to a newer and better life. Meanwhile Sherman has rounded up the bunch of wire tappers with evidence enough to place them behind the bars, and "Coke," whose wound has proven trifling, has had true love aroused in his breast towards Anna.

NUTTY DELIVERS THE MESSAGE TO GARCIA (Jan. 11).—Nutty is commissioned to deliver an enormous canoe to a gentleman living in a town several miles distant. He throws it on his back and starts off. After knocking down several innocent pedestrians he engages a coach driver to help him on his way. Gracefully balancing the canoe across the coach they drive off. They drive down the avenue, clearing everything before them. They come to a draw-bridge, which is open—shoot over the top and land in the water, canoe and all. Guiding it along further he knocks a huge hole in the wall of a house, bringing a family dinner to an abrupt close and swings it the other way, proceeding to demolish the opposite residence, bringing the house down about the occupants ears. He finally arrives at his destination and the owner pleased with the canoe, places an order for three dozen more to be delivered by Nutty.

THE SNAKE CHARMER (Jan. 11).—Mr. Doolittle retires to a saloon to escape his heavyweight spouse who has a habit of browbeating him for the slightest provocation. He is in fear of wifey's wrath on returning home. He is pursuing an eratic course down the street when he comes upon a Hindoo snake charmer, playing a weird melody on a strange pipe to the accompaniment of which various snakes in a gasket are doing the tango. An idea! He steals the pipe and entering the house proceeds to perform his own idea of a charming melody. His wife is waiting for him with a large and healthy rolling pin. She is captivated by the strange sounds. She proceeds to wriggle her two hundred and fifty pounds in gentle and graceful serpentine motion about the floor, on the table and all over the room while Doolittle, amazed with his success, plays the harder. The maid falls in line and joins Mrs. Doolittle on the floor in her snake dance. Meanwhile, the genuine snake charmer discovers the loss of his pipe and finds that his snakes have grown gray-haired from the loss of their favorite melody. Hearing a familiar strain he falls under the influence and wriggles his way through the window into the house. Doolittle, master of all he surveys, continues to play the pipe while his subjects turn themselves inside out, winding up in a heap on the floor.

POWERS.

THEM OL' LETTERS (Jan. 5).—The white-haired veteran sits in his chair by the fire and takes the time-worn letters from his pocket—the pocket next to his heart. He reads them one after another. His thoughts go back to the girl and to what might have been. He sees himself—erect and eager—as he seeks out the girl, folds her in his arms and gives her the ring which means so much!

He sees the other man—young and well favored. He sees himself, in soldier's uniform, starting for the war. He recalls the letter he wrote her, telling her of the battle on the morrow and of his constancy and love. Then the wound, and the pain, and the darkness! The awakening—to find himself a prisoner of war; the release, and the return home to claim the girl who must be weary a'waiting.

A pause and the old man's face is sad as he sees the girl on the arm of the other man, radiant in her wedding gown. The old-time scenes fade and the old man's head drops and a vision of the girl, beautiful as of yore, comes to lead him to the "never-sorrow-land"—and peace!

WHO SO DIGGETH A PIT (Jan. 9).—Wally and the girl are in love. The rich broker covets the girl, but is rejected. The broker bids the father good-bye just as the latter receives a telegram, telling him that he is a large sum short on margins. The broker reads and tells the father he will help him if he is allowed to marry the daughter. The father agrees against his will. The girl agrees to the self-sacrifice to save her father's honor. Money triumphs, and the broker and the girl marry, but as time goes on, he ill-treats her shamefully. She meets Wally and tells him why she could not marry him.

The broker, returning home one night in an ugly temper, comes upon his wife sadly contemplating Wally's photograph. She flees before his threats to her room and telephones to Wally to help her. Wally hurries to her as the broker pounds on her door savagely with his revolver. It goes off and seriously wounds him. The distracted girl opens the door and picks up the revolver. Wallace finds her thus. The policeman, who has heard the shot, joins them. Wally thinking the girl fired the shot, tells the police he did it and is taken away. The broker continues to remain unconscious. The doctor reports to a galvanic battery. He recovers long enough to say that he shot himself.

NESTOR.

THE DEAD LINE (Jan. 7).—John Ross is a brutal cattle king. His son, Harry, something of a gentleman, loves Mabel, daughter of Jones, a sheepman. Ross, his father, is also attracted to her. Ross and Jones clash. Ross strikes the sheepman over the head with the butt end of his revolver and kills him. Harry, fearing his father will cause trouble, follows him. He finds the body of Jones. While he is examining it, he is joined by a sheepherder.

The sheepherder gives the alarm. The war is on. He reports to the sheriff that Harry killed Jones. Ross rides back to his ranch, realizing that his act will precipitate war. He calls all his employees together and plans a campaign. Harry enters and sees evidences of the fight with Jones on the butt of his father's revolver. On a shallow pretext, he exchanges revolvers with his father. Harry is arrested.

The cattle war is now in full sway. Flocks are butchered. Camp equipment is burned, with the result that the dry grass of the prairie catches fire. The sheepmen assemble in a cabin with their families for a last stand. On the way to town, Harry sees the fire, realizes that the girl is in it and escapes to rescue her. He falls unconscious amid the ruins of her home. The sheriff carries the news to Ross that his son is in the flames. An undiscovered emotion rises in Ross. His brutal spirit vanishes and he rushes to save his boy. Mabel arrives at the sheepman's hut. Ross rides in with his son over his saddle. The sheriff arrives and rearrests Harry. Harry is willing to assume the fault of his father, but the father confesses and is arrested. The girl goes away with Harry.

ELECTRA

WHEN URSUS THREW THE BULL (Jan. 9).—"Quo Vadis!! Biggest production ever staged. Straight from Broadway. Lavish Scenery—Renowned Stars—A Trainload of Scenery. For Two Nights Only—Saturday and Monday. Parquette 20 cents—Balcony 15 cents." Thus reads the advance posters of a barn-storming theatrical troupe, and before the glue is dry half of the inhabitants of the village are gathered at the station to await the big show. After the show arrives in town one of the busiest men is the property man. He is sent to get supers to impersonate gladiators, Roman soldiers and the rabble. There are fights between them for the best helmets and other accoutrements of war. And then there is the bull—a cow—that gets into the leading lady's dressing room with the result that she is forced to move to another.

When the manager fails to come through with the salaries after the show there is a strike, lead by the leading man. After securing a new company, made up mostly of townfolk, the show is about to begin, when it is discovered that there is no Ursus, and no bull. A bull is manufactured and the property man is forced to become the hero.

VICTOR.

THE MAGIC SKIN (2 parts—Jan. 5).—The play opens with the introduction of a young man, a great but unrecognized literary genius. This young man is spurned in his love for a society woman and made an object of amusement. Following this he loses his entire fortune over the gambling table, and then goes out to commit suicide. While waiting for night to approach he wanders into an old shop dealing in antiquities. The dealer reads the tragic intention in the young man's face and listens to his story.

The dealer then gives the young man a wild ass skin, which is inscribed: "Possessing me, Thou shalt possess all things, but Thy life is mine. Wish, and Thy wishes shall be fulfilled. But measure Thy desires to the life that is in Thee. This is Thy life. With each wish I must shrink even as Thine own days."

The boy takes the skin. He wishes for love, prosperity and wealth. These are given to him in a perfectly natural manner. But with the fulfillment of each wish he sees, with horror, that the skin has shrunk. Through the society woman, whom he has spurned, he is drawn into a duel. In killing the rival the skin shrinks to almost nothing. But it is after he responds to the caresses of the girl he loves that the skin fades away. With a cry of terror he sees it vanish into thin air and he pays the cost of fulfilled desires with death.

ADMISSION TWO PINS (Jan. 9).—Mr. and Mrs. Hall neglect Bennie and Millie and, at times, are cruel. The children, being sensitive, notice the neglect and their hearts grow sore. Their nurse takes them to a theatrical performance. They become imbued with a desire to have a "show." They rig up a stage and theatrical paraphernalia in the barn and advertise by a rudely written placard that they are going to have a performance—admission two pins.

They make the arrangements, unknown to their parents. On the day of the show Mr. and Mrs. Hall call on some acquaintances and make much of their children in contrast to their attitude at home. Mr. and Mrs. Hall arrive home and notice that their garments have been taken and start out to wreck summary punishment on their children. They go separately to the barn, notice the sign and then take positions on opposite sides of the barn and peep through cracks.

The show opens. Millie and Bennie impersonate the action of their parents. The parents see the little crude stage pantomine of their neglect and become remorseful. They withdraw from their peeping and meet in front of the barn, both contrite and filled with love for their children. They enter the barn and take Millie and Bennie in their arms. Hall dismisses the audience by showering a pocketful of coins to them.

GOLD SEAL.

THE LIE (2 parts—Jan. 6).—Auld MacGregor and his son and daughter are contrasted with another family in the village, who are of a different school. Mac's children realize that they have not the clothes which their father could well afford and they urge him to treat them better.

Itching to lay his hands on MacGregor's money, a gambler in the town cultivates the son's friendship. Returning with some winnings the boy lies to the father with reference where he got it.

There is a young fellow in the village, Arthur, who has fallen foul of the gambler and in a spirit of vindicativeness he tells MacGregor where his son got his money. Shortly after there is a fight in the saloon between the boy and the gambler. The sister shoots with a revolver she had picked up. There is another shot from Arthur's gun, which is not noticed. The girl is accused, and it is here that the boy tries to get his father to lie and secure an alibi. See the film to learn what happens.

SLIM SLAM'EM SLAMMED (Jan. 5).—A hobo succeeds in landing a job in a motion picture studio. But his inexperience is soon discovered and he is kicked out. He steals a bunch of newspapers from a stand and, using them as a pillow, falls asleep. He dreams he is made the leading man in a musical comedy company. He also dreams that, at the last moment, he fails to make good and is thrown from the theater. As he awakens from his dream, he realizes that he is being pounced upon by a gang of angry newsboys.

THE WATCH DOG OF THE DEEP (2 parts—Jan. 8).—A young man returns to the lighthouse, where his father is in charge, with the hope of marrying his adopted sister. During his absence, however, she had fallen in love with the captain of a schooner. Her only companion on the island was a dog. This dog is bitten by another while it is on the mainland and in turn the dog bites the rejected suitor. The father and adopted sister, both unable to read, do not realize that the young man is sick. The dog has been sent to the mainland for examination. The son receives a letter to the effect that the dog is affected and anyone bitten by it should come for treatment. This letter is torn up. The sister and father piece it and take it with them on their visit to the mainland to secure provisions. They are told of the young man's danger.

The victim has begun to feel the first effects of the disease, though he had laughed off any possibility of his getting it. Night creeps on and with it a fog. The sea captain, returning with his aged parents for the wedding on the island, finds himself in danger when the light fails to appear in its customary place.

The old father and girl, after much difficulty, arrive at the island; the father is forced to struggle with his own son to save his own life. When the son is accidently killed, the old man is heartbroken. He rebels against fate, crying: "I have tended this light for forty years and now my boy is dying," and his interest in the darkened light above that is to save lives, slakens. The girl has climbed to the tower, but is unable to master the difficult lights. The ship carrying her sweetheart is almost upon the rocks. She calls the old man. He hears the call and he finds that the cry of duty is stronger in his breast even than any other and he responds.

FIGHTING IS NO BUSINESS (Jan. 6).—On the street Mosha's boy gets into a fight with another and is sent home crying. Mosha goes out to lick the fellow that dared to pick on his son when he hears of it. A tough interferes with Mosha and Mosha straightway knocks him down. Mosha is put down by his friends, who see this as a great fighter.

There is a champion heavyweight in town who offers $500 to anyone who can stand against him for three rounds. Telling him of the big offer, the friends persuade Mosha to fight the fellow. He arrives at the ring and throws a faint when he gets sight of the champion. The fight commences. Mosha gets walloped proper. He beats it from the ring with the fighter after him. Both are arrested and hauled before the judge for being improperly clad. Mosha is fined ten bucks for being a prize-fighter, while the other fellow is discharged.

SHADOWED—(Jan. 6).—Mrs. Gladding, madly in love with her husband, is furious when she finds a note to him from one, Iola, asking him to call on her. However, Iola simply desires Gladding to bridge over a quarrel between herself and her sweetheart. When Gladding leaves the house his wife follows dressed as a man.

Serious complications arise in the street when hubby tries to shake her off. She is arrested by a detective for impersonating a detective. She had said that she was one in order to escape him. She breaks loose and runs home with both the detective and her husband after her. She rushes to her room and manages to change clothes and hide the discarded before the detective arrives. She explains that she has been asleep and was awakened by a man running through the room and out the window. To hubby, later, she explains her motives. He takes her to his friends house and when she learns the truth she repents for being suspicious.

THE RING (Jan. 11).—Though Mr. and Mrs. Gray are supposed to be in comfortable circumstances, the husband has met business reverses and has been declared a bankrupt. It is after the wife has just completed a lavish social that he tells her. Disgruntled, she goes with him to live at a cheap apartment house. Gray secures employment with a rich broker. Mrs. Gray's friend insists on taking her one afternoon to a party. There she meets Mr. Norman, her husband's employer. Norman, struck with her, pays fast attentions. Some time later Norman sends Mrs. Gray a diamond ring that Mr. Gray has accidentally seen in the office. When Gray returns that evening and finds it on his wife he demands to know where she got it. She lies by saying that she found it.

Norman, suspecting the intimacy, resolves to know just how far it has gone. Meantime, Mrs. Gray decides to return the ring and, after writing a note, takes the ring to Mrs. Allen. Here they are met by Norman. Mr. Gray has followed Norman. Gray rushes into the house. The party attempt to conceal Mrs. Gray. The husband draws a revolver —there is a struggle and a shot, which goes through the door, enters Mrs. Gray's shoulder. A doctor is called. Mr. Gray is about to leave when Mrs. Allen shows him the note. Convinced that his wife is innocent, that her relations with his employer have been without tint, he takes his wife in his arms and forgives, and prays for her hasty recovery from the slight wound.

BISON.

THE ELEVENTH HOUR (2 parts—Jan. 10).—Clifford's employer is shot down at his side while working over plans. Clifford's revolver, with his name inscribed on the butt, is found outside the window. Clifford is arrested on this evidence, combined with other evidence of less importance, tried and convicted. It is a tragic moment when he is condemned to die, for he loves the daughter of the man he is accused of murdering. Another man, an employee of the dead man, who seeks to marry the daughter for her money, was really back of the killing. He it was who urged an Indian to shoot Clifford, his rival. But the Indian, being drunk at the time, mixes the men and shoots the employer.

On the day of the execution Alice, the daughter, is drifting down the river in a canoe when she observes an Indian swept over the rapids. She rescues the Indian in a dying condition, and he confesses that he shot her father. They are miles from the county seat where the execution of Clifford is taking place. She drags the Indian to an automobile and the race with death begins.

The villain has learned of the Indian's confession and intercepts the girl. While one of her henchmen is fighting off the villain, the girl escapes with the Indian to a logging flume, which carries timber the county seat. She constructs an impromptu boat and resumes the race to the gallows.

The villain gets possession of the automobile and races in the same direction. While dashing wildly over a precipitous mountain road, the steering knuckle of the machine breaks and the machine and occupant dash into an abyss.

At the scaffold the crowd awaits the moment when the death trap will fall. There is a commotion when Alice and the Indian enter. The execution is stayed a moment. Alice drags the Indian to the sheriff to hear his confession. Clifford is liberated and declared innocent.

JOKER.

SOME NIGHT-MARE (Jan. 10).—In the course of a trip Max purchases a horse to be given to his wife as a birthday present. Their birthdays are but a few days apart and upon his arrival home his wife presents him with a watch containing a miniature picture of herself. Max's son removes his wife's photo and replaces it with that of an actress. The wife discovers the change and there is war—vocal and physical. However, Max explains and is forgiven—until his wife opens a letter addressed to Max, which reads: "Got her off all right, but had trouble putting her on train. Does your wife suspect?"

She does suspect. She does worse things than suspect. She reports Max to the police as a white-slaver. The police arrive and a bloodless battle ensues. Honors are about divided until the wife learns that the note refers to a mare. Then she turns upon the police and routs them.

REX.

AN ARROWHEAD ROMANCE (Jan. 8).—Bob is a hotel guide and in his simple way he loves May, a mule tender's daughter. The even tenor of their mountain life is undisturbed until the arrival of a banker and Betty, his daughter. Betty, a woman of the world, is struck with Bob's rustic type of manhood, and he with her cultivated manners and dress.

In the days that follow the mule-tenders daughter is left alone. Bob tells Betty of his love. She repulses him, telling him to make something more than a guide of himself before he speaks of love. The flirt unwittingly arouses his ambition. He leaves the mountains.

The next summer the banker and his daughter return to the mountains. Bob returns also, nattily dressed, a different man, and is about to propose to Betty, when she introduced a young man with her as her future husband. Bob sees that she is merely a flirt. He returns to the mule-tender's daughter, places his newly awakened love at her feet, and is accepted.

THE CYCLE OF ADVERSITY (Jan. 11).—By day Robert Cummings, a struggling playwright, works over a linotype machine in a newspaper office, and at night he writes his play. In these dark days there is one bright spot. Her name is May, a waitress in a coffee house. He tells her of his dreams and she believes in him. Cummings finishes his play. Worn out by the strenuous labor, he falls asleep over the completed manuscript and is late for work. He is discharged. He takes his play to a theatrical producer. Without work and discouraged, he goes to the coffee house. Looking inside he sees a rough making advances toward May. Cummings enters and interferes. There is a fight and he is knocked over the head and rendered unconscious. He is removed to a hospital for an operation.

In the meantime his play has been accepted, although the producer cannot find the author. After a lapse of eight weeks May takes up a paper and reads of the successful run of the drama. She goes to the theatrical manager, informs him of Cumming's whereabouts, and leads him to the hospital. Cummings is convalescent. He receives payment for his play and is invited to attend with the producer that night. May returns to the restaurant and finds that she is discharged. She hurries back to the hospital, but Cummings has left, and she does not know his address. With her last money she buys a ticket for the gallery. From his station of honor Cummings sees his sweetheart in the gallery. He goes to her and leads her into the box, and together they watch their play.

FRONTIER.

SLIM'S STRATEGY (Jan. 8).—The small boy's proverbial liking for jam was never more fully developed than the intensity with which the boys of the Bar S coveted Mrs. Burley's apple pies. This weakness developed into a mania. Slim solicits the aid of Fat to steal the pies, but when they help a wounded cowboy to the house, the two learn that an ailment of some sort will bring quicker results. Fat forces Slim to soak him on the jaw, and with the bandaged face, works on Mrs. Burley's sympathies to the extent of a pie. The other boys discover the trick, and soon follow Fat with various ailments, all made with the unwilling assistance of Slim.

Slim goes mad with jealous rage. He seeks Molly and tells her what has happened. Molly, to teach the boys a lesson, accompanies Slim to the village doctor, who is also let in on the joke. He returns with the young couple to the ranch house, where the boys are treated, one at a time, to the sight of an assortment of hatchets, saws and other instruments of torture. They hurl themselves head first out of the nearest window. Slim, by way of reward, is treated to an apple pie supper in the company of the doctor, Mrs. Burley and her pretty daughter. That night, after supper, Slim returns to his room well pleased with the pie feed.

CROSS ROADS (Jan. 10).—Williams, an old prospector, strikes pay dirt. His daughter, Milly, and Tom, a young prospector, are sweethearts. Larry, a tenderfoot, comes to the cabin and learns of the strike. Williams has been hurt by a fall, and Tom, going to investigate the discovery, is met by Larry Larry proposes to Tom that they file the claim for themselves. Tom knocks him down. Larry returns to the cabin and informs Milly that Tom proposed to him that they should file for themselves. Milly refuses to believe. Tom rides to the claim agent to file. So does Larry. Milly decides to take no chances and leaves for town herself. She arrives

JUST PLAIN COMMON SENSE tells you—When you want to SEE yourself you use a Mirror. Because you SEE yourself better with a Mirror than any other means in the world.
Now the same thing applies. When you want to SEE motion pictures, use a MIRROR SCREEN. Because you SEE the pictures so much plainer, better and clearer on a Mirror Screen than on any other surface under the sun. Besides it tickles your patrons and makes picture fans. It's a fact. The difference between a motion picture on a MIRROR SCREEN and any other screen of any other kind is the same comparison between seeing your own reflection in a fine French plate glass mirror and in a mud puddle. The "MIRROR SCREEN" is a Mirror. at the cross roads ahead of Larry and changes the signs. When Larry arrives, he takes the road marked "To Goldite," but which really leads into the desert.

Milly meets Tom just as he is coming from the claim agent's office. Without giving him a chance for explanation she bitterly accuses him. Larry soon discovers that he is on the wrong trail and turns back. He meets Tom at the cross roads, learns that he has filed, and forces him back to the Williams cabin. Milly returns to the cabin. Larry has Tom covered with his gun. Milly thanks Larry and denounces Tom. Tom tries to protest. Larry tells her to search Tom for the papers, which she does, only to discover that they are made out in her name. Larry is given orders to move on, and Tom is forgiven.

MAJESTIC.

HELEN'S STRATAGEM (Dec. 28).—John Rockwood, an energetic young lawyer, was nominated for district attorney, by a political party which had been long out of power, and whose shrewd boss, Martin Rowley, determined should control the destinies of the city. Rockwood, brilliant and popular, was sure to draw many votes, and after his nomination it became clear that his election was almost a foregone conclusion. The candidate's little sister, Helen, a girl of sixteen, had been, since childhood, a cripple.

Crampton, a wealthy manufacturer, was a persistent violator of the fire ordinances, and, as a result, many of his employees were injured in a fire. The district attorney refused to interfere, but when John's attention was drawn to the matter, he promised to prosecute vigorously, if elected. Crampton, in alarm, consulted Rowley, who told him that John's statement was merely a campaign story, and that he would not be harmed. Rowley felt safe in making this promise, for John was a devoted admirer of his daughter, Maude, and he believed that he would do anything rather than lose favor with her.

To calm Crampton's fears, Rowley wrote John, telling him that he had assured the manufacturer that there would be no prosecution in the event of Rockwood's election, but to his amazement, he received a letter stating that John would have nothing to do with such a dishonest transaction. Rowley angrily called up John on the telephone and the candidate listened with amazement to what the boss said. Helen, who was in the room, timidly touched John on the arm, and the amazed young man listened to a confession from his little sister which surprised and touched him. The letter he had written to Rowley assured the boss that he would comply with his wishes. Helen read the letter, and, grief-stricken that her brother could stoop so low, destroyed it and substituted a missive which angrily rejected the boss' proposal.

Shamed by Helen's action, John turned to the telephone and told the boss that he meant every word he said. A boss generally can revenge himself upon a disobedient candidate, and John fully expected that his career was ended. The election, however, was very satisfactory to John, for he was triumphantly elected district attorney, and, best of all, he found that the grim old politician respected a man who was a good fighter and considered him worthy of his daughter's hand.

THE BABY (Dec. 30).—Ida Maley was a familiar figure on the "Great White Way." When the glamour of her life wore away, a vague discontent possessed her, something she strongly desired, and yet could not define. Ida was at a handsome restaurant with friends of her own kind, while an entirely different scene was taking place in her boarding house. In one of the shabby rooms a young mother was dying, leaving a baby alone in the world. When Ida returned to her home the boarding house keeper summoned her to the room where the mother lay dead. The landlady asked her to care for the baby until it could be turned over to the authorities. Ida consented, for the little mite possessed a strong appeal to her, but after the mother was buried she found herself unable to surrender the child. The natural love which all women have for children was the cause for her previous unrest, and the baby her solace. Her gay companions urged her to return to them, but a pair of little baby hands drew her back and saved her from temptation.

In a little country town she made a home with the baby, and found happiness in the love the little tot gave her. Several years passed and the country people grew to respect and like the pleasant dressmaker and her little "daughter." A merry party of automobilists passed through the village, and recognized in the dressmaker their companion of years gone by. They urged her to return to the old life, but she resolutely declined.

The village gossip chanced to overhear the conversation, and repeated it with great elaboration. The people of the little town decided that Ida Maley was not a fit person to associate with, and a committee was appointed to request her to leave town. The committee never delivered the message, and Ida Maley still lives in the village, beloved and respected by all, for a scene of which they were unconscious eavesdroppers convinced them that she was a most desirable neighbor and the best guardian the child could have.

EDUCATING HIS DAUGHTERS (Jan. 3).—A retired capitalist rears his three motherless daughters in the seclusion of his country place, away from the gaze of man. An accidental meeting with three wholesome young fellows whose automobile stalls outside the grounds, produce consternation in dad and damages six hearts in pairs for all eternity. Tom, the boldest, gains admission to the home as a spinster teacher, and by coquetting with dad rouses that gentleman to a sudden recognition of too youthful appearance and finds himself stalled permanently. In the studyroom he manages his disguise nicely, but in the boudoir he has an embarrassing moment when the three fascinating pupils perch about in their pajamas and chat over their new teacher and offer their services as maids. At last he gets them off to bed and himself retires; but his two partners rouse him by climbing the wall at his window and demanding recognition of their existence. He agrees to arrange a meeting with the girls. Next day he takes the girls into the woods for nature study, and the affinities are in a seventh heaven until Tom rudely cuts off the meeting, maintaining the character of teacher even before the boys, and affecting great anger with the girls. They soothe him with tearful kisses, to the envy of his team-mates, and he escorts them away, hugely enjoying the chagrin of Jack and Fred. He encounters his greatest difficulty in maintaining his impersonation when he accepts the kisses of Peggy. The third meeting takes place at the party which Tom insists is necessary to test the firmness of the girls' antipathy for the odious opposite sex. The ballroom, the conservatory, and the moonlight garden complete the undoing of the years of education. Dad himself is completely bowled over by the teacher in her ball room gown, and grows more persistent in his attentions. Tom endures him while the others woo. Dad gives pursuit and the boys follow dad, collecting Tom's wardrobe, which he loses. Peggy had suspicions when she detected a roughness in Tom's cheek earlier in the evening, and now the complete exposure comes when Tom backs into the conservatory in corset and trousers. Peggy is tearful, her sisters furious. Dad, lagging behind in the chase, is the only one still unenlightened. He corners Tom behind a screen. The girls, watching from a hiding place, see the humor of the whole deception and forgive the three scamps. Tom and dad play hide-and-seek. Tom refuses dad's ring and kiss unless he agrees to let the girls marry the men of their choice. Dad consents, gives the ring and demands the kiss. Tom resists, the screen is upset and so is dad when he sees Tom's trousers. The ring goes to Peggy. Dad stands by his promise, which the girls have overheard, and Tom stands by his girl and tenders the kiss, but dad resigns.

THE POWER OF LIGHT (2 parts—Jan. 5).—Cliff Jackson, the eighteen-year-old son of a mountaineer, is possessed of a strong determination to conquer his father, who operates an illicit still, as also his confederates by love and kindness, rather than through the strong arm of the law. His father interprets the boy's innate disgust for liquor and injustice as personal animosity and defiance of his authority. The son leaves the home.

In the city he forms the acquaintance of a family, which although poor, takes him in and gives him his first taste of learning, which although crude, awakens in him a stronger desire for knowledge. A kindly pastor interests himself in the studious young fellow, and he is sent to school and college to become a minister. The daughter in the poor family and the minister's daughter become rivals, but the thought of his people's needs leads him to select the girl whom he believes can love his people.

After his ordination he marries Jennie Bentley, the girl who taught him elementary arithmetic and grammar, and she returns with him to his home. The government officers are on the trail of the moonshiners and are making an attack when Cliff rides up the mountain road, and a stray bullet hits him. He is taken to his home and the officers, at his request, leave him to handle the situation by teaching love and kindness rather than by the arbitrary display of arms and authority.

Cliff's ambition is soon realized and he is privileged to demolish the still in the presence of those who, for long years offered defiance to the law and now resolved to observe the law because of the power of the light that has been brought to them by the ambitious son of their leader.

THE SON OF THOMAS GRAY (Jan. 10).—The son of Thomas Gray, after his graduation, returns from college, becomes his father's partner, and later, when his parent's health begins to fail him, his successor. The income from a tonic, which, unknown to the rest of the family, contains morphine, then becomes the family's sole means of subsistence. The doctor's son is highly ambitious and through hard work achieves renown and success. He becomes interested in social reform and pays frequent visits to the slums, where on one occasion, he sees a victim of morphine in the throes of death. A bottle labeled "Gray's Tonic" strikes his eye, but of course, he knows nothing. A fellow physician, who has accompanied him, however, pockets the bottle.

At the meeting of the Pure Foods and Drug Board, of which he is a member, the doctor's son delivers a lecture on the evils wrought through lax censorship of drugs. His fellow physician voices his suspicion of Gray's Tonic, and suggests that they analize it. The son is given the commission and told to report the result at their next meeting. Then, while the aged parent awaits the result of the fateful analysis, the awful knowledge is revealed to the son. In an emotional scene the aged physician pleads with his son for the sake of the family honor and for their happiness, not to reveal the secret.

Which shall it be? During a restless night he is tormented by visions: his parents reduced to poverty and shame, the scene in the slums, and finally that of the chairman handing him his commission. The next day the parent, awaiting in feverish anxiety, hears the final decision, and in horror and rage disowns him. Then the hand of misfortune falls on the erstwhile family. Dishonor, a heavy fine, and the revocation of his license are the penalties invoked by the court, and poverty and want follow in the steps of the decision. The son pleads in vain for the privilege of supporting the family. The father will have nothing of him.

The hand of fate, however, brings about the long delayed reunion. When about to be evicted from their squalid lodgings, the landlord turns out to be none other than their son. The son takes them at once to his home and after his skillful treatment, soon restores his father to health.

PRINCESS.

A RURAL FREE DELIVERY ROMANCE (Jan. 2).—Ruth acts as housekeeper for her miserly Uncle Herman. Fearing the loss of her services, Herman opposes a love affair between Ruth and Fred, the rural mail carrier. A letter from the grocer threatens Herman with a law-suit for the non-payment of a bill. Herman then conceives a contemptible scheme to avoid payment by placing Fred under suspicion of theft and thereby also prevent his marriage to Ruth. Herman writes two letters, exact duplicates, and addresses both to the grocer. In one letter, examined by two witnesses, he places a sum of money, but prior to the arrival of the mail-carrier the crafty Herman, by distracting the attention of his witnesses, substitutes the duplicate letter which he submits for registration upon the arrival of the carrier.

Upon receipt of the registered letter containing no money, the grocer enters a complaint at the postoffice. The case is put in the hands of a P. O. inspector and Fred is called to account. The evidence is against the carrier. Herman holds a receipt for the letter. Two witnesses swear the letter contained money. The grocer and his clerk declare no money was received. It is proven that Fred has recently purchased an expensive ring. He is believed guilty and is about to be removed from the service.

In the meantime Ruth finds an empty envelope, addressed to the grocer, in Herman's waste basket, and learning of Fred's trouble from the substitute carrier, her suspicions are aroused. She hastens to the postoffice with the new evidence. One of Herman's witnesses discovers upon this second envelope a tobacco stain imprint of his thumb. This fact, proven by the inspector's microscope, identifies the empty envelope, which has never been registered, as the one which contained the money, when examined by the witnesses. Fred is vindicated and free to seek happiness with the girl whose keen wit and quick action saved his reputation.

THE HEAD WAITER (Dec. 28).—The head waiter was thoroughly impressed with his own importance and he ruled the fashionable restaurant, where he was employed, with a rod of iron. He knew he was brilliant, he realized that he was beautiful and he was thouoghly convinced that the majority of the women who dined at his establishment were very much in love with him. There was one lady with whom he was particularly impressed, a Mrs. May Maverick, but was not only beautiful, but a prominent figure in society. The head waiter paid her all the court he could and dreamed of the day when he might be on the level of the quality with her. One eventful day when she dropped in to luncheon, he believed that his dream had come true, for she gazed at him approvingly and finally slipped him her visiting card with the instruction "Call this evening at eight." The head waiter called, arrayed in his best and convinced that he made a conquest. He was surprised when she summoned other members of her family to look him over, and dumbfounded when he discovered that he had been summoned for business reasons, and not for love. The society leader needed a new butler, and had picked out the headwaiter as the man for the place. It was a terrible shock to him, but one disappointment cannot destroy the faith of a head waiter in his own ability, and in a very short time he was as proud and self-important as he ever had been before.

AN AMATEUR ANIMAL TRAINER (Dec. 30).—A wealthy young broker fell in love at first sight with a young woman whom he met in a great city. His courtship was ardent and rapid, and although she confessed that she loved him, the girl insisted that the broker must first win her father's consent. Father, it appeared, owned an animal farm in a remote New England village, but the broker journeyed down there to win his would-be father-in-law's approval. The old animal trainer had some peculiar ideas. In an up-to-date way he was like the kings of old who evolved peculiar tests before they would award their daughter's hand in marriage. In this case the animal trainer led the broker to where an elephant was tied. He told him that the elephant was a particularly vicious beast, but that if he, the broker, could tame him, he could marry the girl, all of which would lead one to believe that the animal trainer did not take a strong fancy to the suitor.

The broker loved the girl so dearly that he even tried to tame the elephant for her sake, but he found the task beyond his ability. He was just about to give up in despair when a little girl came along, learned his sad story, and suggested a way out of the difficulty. It cost him a lot of money, but as he was able to satisfy the animal trainer that he had made good, he did not count the cost, and the cash he paid for his unique lesson helped to save the little girl and her father from bankruptcy. Thus did the adventure turn out to be a good thing all around, even for the elephant.

THEIR GOLDEN WEDDING (Jan. 2).—It was an eventful day in the life of the old couple, for it marked the fiftieth anniversary of their married life. Their only child, a daughter, had come to visit them, bringing her husband, and her stalwart son. There were congratulations and presents and that afternoon the old man, although happy, was tired. He excused himself when the others went for a walk about the place and sat on the front doorstep, thinking of the days that were past.

Looking backward is something we all do at some time and the events of a lifetime passed in review before the aged man. He thought of the time when he had first met his wife, a beautiful village girl, and how their wedding had been postponed because of his determination to fight for the flag when the Civil War started. He did his duty there, he was glad to recollect; but was dangerously wounded and the doctor regarded his case as hopeless. Then the girl came all the way from her distant home, was married to him on what they had thought to be his deathbed, and then tenderly nursed him back to health and strength again. She was the one girl in the world to him then, and she had always been and always would be. His thoughts then passed to his only daughter, and he recollected how happy he was when she was born and how he watched her as she grew up. He expected to see her add fame to his name as an artist, and was wroth when she fell in love with a poor young man. He would have prevented the marriage, but his wife won him over, pointing out that it was no more than right that the daughter, like parents, should marry for love alone.

The episodes of his life came back to him one by one, and he was still musing when the others returned, and wife and daughter came to him lovingly. He reflected with relief that although his life had not been one marked with sensational incidents, yet it did not give him pain to look back upon it, nor was he afraid to face the future with the wife he loved by his side. A golden wedding day is eventful. A golden wedding day without regrets for the days that have gone by is ideal.

home she realizes by a movement of the curtain that the man who controls her life waits for the papers in the next room. As she starts to take them to him a letter falls to the floor from the envelope containing the plans. It is a letter from the lieutenant's mother expressing faith in his execution of his duty to his country, and she realizes what this will mean to the mother. She finally decides that she would rather have the son meet disgrace than herself meet death. In a reverie she has a vision of her own life starting when as a young girl she left home. The vision of her own mother causes her to decide to return the plans which she does. She then walks slowly into the room where death awaits her. A great struggle is apparent by the quivering of the curtain and in the last scene the man's foot is seen just going out of the window, while the woman lies in a huddled heap on the floor with a smile on her face.

HIS AWFUL VENGEANCE (Dec. 31).—Jim and Nell are sweethearts. They are sitting by the roadside one day when Harold, a wicked city chap, happens to ride by in his automobile. He rides down the road a way and then orders his chauffeur to drive back. As they drive past Nell and Jim the auto slows down, Harold gets out on the runboard and grabs Nell into the machine, which drives off at terrific speed. Harold takes Nell to his mansion in New York, but she spurns him. He locks her up in a room and she climbs out of the window and escapes. Harold discovers the escape. All this time Jim is still running on the road to New York.

Harold hurries to the office of the Villain's Union. Inside there is a clerk at a desk and a long bench on which are seated eight or ten villains, all dressed alike. On the wall is a sign: "Villians to hire by the hour, day, week or month." Also another sign reading "RATES:—Pursuing, $1 an hour." Harold hires the whole bunch of villains to pursue Nell and they all start out.

Nell is trying to escape pursuit. At a corner she bumps into a villain. She turns and runs down the other way and bumps into another villain. Every way she turns she runs into a villain. She starts in to walk hurriedly. After her walk the whole crew of villains. She walks into a vacant house, locks the door after herself and sinks in relief on the floor. The villains break into the vacant house and go to the room over the one in which Nell is hiding. They get a saw and saw a big hole in the floor. The villains drop through into Nell's room. Nell jumps out the window; the villains follow. The villains catch her and take her to the old bridge. Harold is waiting for them. He asks Nell if she is ready to be his, but she again spurns him. Harold tells the villains to do their worst. The villains grab Nell, tie her hands and feet and place her on the bridge railing ready to push her in. Harold gives her one more chance. She spurns him again. Harold orders the villains to do their dirtiest. They are just ready to push her into the river when the town clock strikes twelve and all the noon whistles blow. Like all good union workmen the villains stop work immediately, take their lunch pails out of their pockets, sit down on the bridge and start to eat. Harold remonstrates with them, but they show him their union badges. "I will push her in the river myself," says Harold, and just then Jim rushes up, gives him a punch on the jaw and rescues Nell.

SEEING STARS AND STRIPES (Dec. 31).—Casey Murray, a grocer, follows the advice of his friend and burns sulphur in his store one night. Upon reaching home he finds the house locked, and as his wife has the only key, he is forced to enter the house via the cellar window. On the inside, he finds a note from his wife, who unintentionally forgot and left it on the desk, meaning to put it on the outside. The note was to the effect that she had gone to the club, and that he would find the key under the mat on the doorstep. This, of course, makes Casey very angry, and in his anger he throws the note out of the window.

An escaped convict happens by, and the note falls at his feet. He at once secures the key from under the mat and enters the house. He finds his way into Casey's room, where poor Casey is sound asleep. He (the convict) wastes no time in getting into Casey's clothes, and then leaving his own clothes for poor Casey, he makes his escape.

The convict, dressed in Casey's clothes, passes the grocery. He sees the smoke, caused by the sulphur burning on the inside, coming from the cracks, and thinking the store to be on fire, he turns in the alarm. Casey is telephoned that his store is on fire, and of course he has to dress in the convict's clothes. After several adventures with the police, poor Casey finally succeeds in reaching his store, where the firemen have broken in. The convict (still in Casey's clothes) is sitting near the rear of the store, waiting for a good chance to "make a haul," when Casey's wife, who is coming home from the club, finds him, and she, thinking him to be her husband who is heartbroken over her actions, goes to him and puts her arms around him. To her surprise, he is a stranger to her. She runs for help and the convict fearing arrest, climbs into the side window of the grocery. Casey's wife finds poor Casey in the hands of the police, and runs to him. The convict is overcome by the fumes of the sulphur and rushes out the front door into the arms of the police.

SOME ROGUES AND A GIRL (Jan. 3).—Old Miller, a recluse—feeling that the end is near and knowing that he can trust no one—writes his granddaughter, May, to come at once. In the letter he tells her that his money is in the safe, that it all belongs to her and writes the combination of the safe. Rightly mistrusting his one servant, Peter, he struggles out to mail the letter, but collapses on his way, and is assisted to his home again by a traveler named Bond, who promises to deliver the letter for him.

Peter, knowing that the end has come to his master, starts to rob the house. But a crook who has entered the house doesn't like the idea of Peter getting away with so much loot, so, while Peter is getting the wagon, the crook removes the loot from the trunk and substitutes the dead body of old Miller. Peter returns, places his trunk in the wagon and then to hide his crime, sets fire to the house. At the depot he discovers that the last train to New York has gone. Peter takes his trunk to a hotel.

Meantime, the crook has discovered the fire, and tries to get the combination of the safe. By holding the blotter to the mirror, he learns that the old man has written to his granddaughter to come and also has told her the combination of the safe. In the meantime, Bond delivers the letter to May and she decides to ride back in an auto with Bond. He leaves her at the door of the house and promises to send a doctor.

Bond leaves a message at the doctor's house. He arrives at the hotel in time to hear Peter scream and fall when he opens the trunk. Bond and others enter the room. Bond recognizes the body and thinks of the possible danger to the girl. He hurries back to the house. The crook has captured the girl and threatens her with death, unless she tells the combination. Bond arrives and struggles with the crook. The doctor arrives, and he and Bond overcome the crook and rescue the girl. Then as Bond seems only interested in the girl, and the girl has only eyes for Bond, the doctor concluded that it is a parson they want and not a doctor.

AN AMATEUR SPORTSMAN (Jan. 6).—Being in Mr. O'Flaherty's debt to the tune of $25,000, Montrose sends him a check for $10,000, and states that the rest is more than made up in value by three race horses which are in training at Sam Piper's. O'Flaherty sets out to assume ownership and at once succumbs to the charms of Sam's eldest daughter Viola. Knowing, however, that he will have a better chance of winning Viola's regard if his horses do well in a coming race, he takes care to superintend everything the horses do, and meanwhile makes violent efforts to captivate the fair Viola. As it happens the horses do well, and O'Flaherty seizes the opportunity to make a proposal to the trainer's daughter in broad daylight. His address is rudely interrupted by the sudden appearance of Viola's fiance, a well-known jockey just returned from his successes in England, and the unfortunate O'Flaherty, realizing that a woman's affection is a fickle thing, decides henceforth to pay attention entirely to his horses.

TINY TIM'S SWEETHEART (Jan. 8).—Tiny Tim is separated from his little companion, Gwennie, by Mrs. De Jones, who decides to adopt Gwennie, giving Tim half a dollar by way of compensation. Tim tries to seek forgetfulness in a confectioner's shop without success. Later he visits a cafe and tries to seek oblivion in unlimited supplies of ginger ale, but only succeeds in floating his sorrows. One day he returns. Gwennie finds his hat and seeing the footprints guesses that he has come back. Convinced that he is still waiting his chance to reappear, she returns to the house and fills the hat with cakes. These she then places under a bush so that Tim will see them. In her hurry, however, she has overlooked the circumstance that it is nearly tea time, and the vanishing of the cakes has already been discovered by the cook and by Gwennie's adopted mother. When these latter subsequently look for Gwennie in the garden, it is to find that she and Tim are in each other's arms. The romance then ends with Tim's adoption as Gwennie's brother.

THE MYSTERIOUS FINGER-PRINTS—FANTOMAS: Series 3 (4 parts).—The mystery of the drama is the appearance of the finger-print of a dead artist upon the neck of Princess Sonia Danidoff, whom Fantomas, as Nanteuil, relieves of her pearl necklace, and again on the body of Thomery, a merchant also done to death by the arch villain, Fandor, in the pursuit of his calling, has endeavored to solve the mysteries of these crimes, and eventually recognizes Cranajour, an idiot in the employ of Mother Toulouch, a receiver of stolen goods, as Inspector Juve, of the Criminal Investigation Department. They consult together and decide that Nanteuil, the banker, should be called upon. Already suspicious, when Juve finds a glove of skin upon his hand, suspicion becomes certainty, but before they are able to secure the villain, he backs through an unsuspected door in the wall of the room and once again escapes.

THE DEVIL WITHIN (Three parts).—John Walker has not attempted to conceal the fact that his will leaves almost his entire fortune to his son, Jack, merely providing a small trust for his daughter, Jane, who has recently been married to James Gleason. Gleason, learning of the terms of the will, plots to disgrace Jack in the eyes of his father, and with the aid of a woman, Maude Barnes, causes Jack to be charged with theft. This takes place at Jack's college, but the actual arrest is delayed by Jack's roommate until after the big football game, of which Jack is the star player. The disgrace is sufficient to force Jack to leave college. On his arrival home, a stormy scenes ensues and Jack is ordered from the house by his father, whose mind has been poisoned against him by Gleason. Jack's father is also influenced to make a new will, but Gleason does not know its contents. With contemptible perseverance Gleason also hounds Jack and causes him to be discharged from different positions.

The father dies and Jack returns only to be refused admittance to the house by Gleason. Determined to have a last look at his father, Jack gains entrance and meets little Olive, his niece, of whom he is very fond. Her childish love for Jack prompts her to force him to take her little diamond picture locket as a remembrance. Gleason has opened the safe in the library and has just read the last will which gives Jack the fortune when he reaches the age of twenty-five, provided he does nothing dishonest, in which latter event Gleason's wife is to have it. Gleason foresees that Jack will eventually get the fortune under the terms of the will and thoroughly enraged, he turns away from the safe and catches a glimpse of Jack as he is leaving the house. His clever mind immediately evolves a plot to accuse him of robbing the safe. Jack's possession of the locket aids Gleason as he dramatically accuses Jack. Appearances against him, Jack makes his escape. Tracked by detectives, hungry and desperate, Jack tries to enter a farm house and is only saved from his crime by overhearing a prayer of the farmer's daughter, Edith. In withdrawing, he falls and is seriously injured. The farmer's wife, asking no questions, nurses him to health and he later works and lives with them. Incidentally Jack and Edith grow to love each other.

Gleason continues his association with Maude Barnes, visiting her frequently. A thief, surprised by her alone in her apartment, accidentally shoots her but escapes. The testimony of the elevator boy and Gleason's glove on her table, point conclusively to Gleason as the murderer. Panic-stricken at the circumstantial evidence against him, Gleason flees and hard-pressed by the detectives, evades them by jumping from a fast moving freight train. Fate leads him for refuge to a barn where Jack, with a party, arrives for a barn dance. Confronting Jack, Gleason threatens to disclose his past unless he aids him. Jack, in despair, conceals him in the loft and side-tracks the detectives, but to no avail. The barn catches fire in the midst of the dance and Gleason, still concealed in the hay loft, is fatally injured. Jack risks his life and brings Gleason out alive and receives his reward in an ante-mortem statement from Gleasonn, clearing his name and entitling him to the fortune and—to marry Edith.

FROU FROU (Four Parts—Jan. 1).—Brigard, a French landowner, had two motherless daughters. The elder, Louise, was a joy and a comfort, and thoroughly dependable, no matter what crisis might arise in their domestic life. The younger, Gilberte, was flighty and irresponsible, but deeply loved by her father and sister, who affectionately nicknamed her Frou Frou. Among the gallants who visited the Brigard's rural home, were two deserving of special attention—Henri Sartorys and Compte De Valreas, Henri's great friend. Although the two men were intimate, they were of unlike dispositions. Sartorys was wealthy, industrious and a model citizen. De Valreas, also wealthy, wasted his substance in all kinds of dissipation. Both men loved Frou Frou, but Henri was too modest and too diffident to press his suit, and it seemed for a time as though the girl would be carried off by his reckless rival. Henri, however, finally enlisted the aid of the elder sister not knowing that she secretly loved him. He was so flustrated that at first she thought he was proposing for her hand, but she was speedily undeceived. It was a crushing blow to Louise, but she determined to forward the marriage of Frou Frou and Henri, believing that a man of his character was needed to safely guide her through life.

Frou Frou did not care particularly for Henri, but was indifferent as to her own future, and finally placed all the responsibility on Louise by saying, "I will do as I have always done—placed myself in your hands." In this way the engagement of the two young people was brought about.

Frou Frou and Henri were fairly happy in their married life, but they were never in any way what might be called partners. Frou Frou followed the usual life of an idle, fashionable woman, and Henri regarded her as a charming doll, but never expected to call upon her for any assistance or advice. Their child, Georges, was alternately neglected and petted by his mother, and there were times in days past, although they were in the same house, they did not meet. Frou Frou finally came to the conclusion that a change would be desirable and induced Henri to urge Louise to make her home with them. Then everything ran with regularity and system and Henri found that life was much more satisfactory. In the course of time, however, Frou Frou awakened to the realization of the fact that she was personally a nonentity in her own home. Henri and Louise both loved her, but neither thought of consulting her. She was simply a pretty child of whom they were very fond, and they would have laughed if anyone told them that she desired to be regarded as a grown-up. In her poor, little, inexperienced way, Frou Frou tried to win back the place that belonged to her, but all in vain. Finally she gave up the unequal struggle and eloped with De Valreas, who had still paid constant attention to her. Before going she saw her sister and in an exciting scene blamed her for all the trouble, saying, "Husband, child, everything you have taken from me. Keep them well."

Frou Frou's rash step resulted in misery for all concerned. Her husband tracked them down, and in a duel killed the faithless De Valreas. Frou Frou's health failed and she was near death's door when her faithful sister found her and took her back to the home of her childhood. There she lingered for a few months, long enough to make her peace with the husband and child she had deserted, and died with the hope that the sins of Frou Frou might be forgiven in another world.

THE ACCUSING VOICE (2 parts—Jan. 3).—Gaston Beraud is employed as assistant to Mr. Launay, of the firm of Dammond & Co., gramophone manufacturers. He is bribed by a rival firm to steal the formula of an important invention. He is discovered in the act by Mr. Launay, who accuses him of robbing him. The accusation was recorded on a gramophone record, and later proved to be his downfall. Gaston realized that he was irretrievably ruined. Not only had he lost all hope of marrying the girl to whom he was engaged, but his professional career was at an end. Too late he reflected that the curse of gambling had been his ruin, and he passed out of the lives of those who loved him regretting that his fall might easily have been avoided.

APEX.

THE FALL OF FRANCE (Three Parts).—Long before the bloody laurel wreath encircled the German Imperial throne in Versailles, Wilhelm I of Prussia had had the opportunity of gaining the control of all Germany. It was at the time that Napoleon III, after the year '66, suggested an alliance. But under no circumstances would King Wilhelm be willing to owe the German Imperial throne to the help of a foreign country. However, the war party at the Parisian Court, which demanded revenge for Sadowa, became more insistent, until the Emperor Napoleon, in order to strengthen his dwindling popularity with the people, unwillingly lent his ear to the advice of the Empress Eugenie, and permitted the first excuse to be used to provoke the neighboring state. The question of the succession to the Spanish throne, in itself of little importance, gave the desired opportunity to the hotheads of the Tuilerie.

It was in July of the year 1870, and King Wilhelm was enjoying his short vacation at Bad Ems, when the clouds of war rolled slowly over the Rhine. Benedetti, the French envoy, had been chosen for the task of finding out how great demands the Prussians would submit to. He delivered himself of his mission on the promenade of Ems in a deliberately frivolous manner. But the stone rebounded upon its hurler: Bismarck at once informed the German people of the French demands, and a shout of indignation went up. As the king returned to Berlin on the 15th of July, he was received at every halting place by great crowds of people, with joyful acclamation. After the declaration of war there burst forth in all great Germany a fire of enthusiasm.

The arming of Germany proceeded with unheard of speed; now already the first fruits of the Prussian drill which had so often been made fun of were plainly visible. The advance marches were begun from all points of the country simultaneously. In this way an enormous advantage was gained over France. Germany was thus able to force the fight on French ground. It was almost like a tremendous symbol of world's history; that it was again toward the Rhine that the German military chooses.

The German army marched upon it in three divisions. The first under General von Steinmetz was stationed at Saarlouis; the second under Prince Frederich Karl had approximately the same goal; the third under the Crown Prince advanced to the Rhine in the neighborhood of the heights of Karlsruhe. Besides this, there was established in North Germany a strong reserve army under Vogel von Falckenstein. One of the first deeds of war, the storming of Gaisbergs under Major von Kanfenberg, gives a shining example of the spirit of the German army. The battle in the open country is succeeded by the horrors of a hand-to-hand conflict in the cities. There follows Weissenburg and Spichern. King Wilhelm was permitted not only to fasten iron crosses on the breasts of his valiant soldiers, but also to embrace his own son as a victorious commander.

Then the days of Mars-la-Tour and St. Privat. In the meanwhile, the iron circle was drawing closer and inexorably around Sedan. Napoleon's last army saw itself hemmed in closely about a bend in the River Maas. The battle of their dispair was fought on the morning of the first of September; at mid-day the white flag appeared on the walls of the fortification. Napoleon sent General Reille to the Prussian camp with his sword and a letter.

The king immediately ordered a cessation of the fighting and Bismarck and Moltke saw to the drawing up of the conditions of surrender. The following day, in the little neglected Castle of Bellevue near Doncherrt, King Wilhelm received his prisoners. There the descendants of Queen Louise and Napoleon I met. Napoleon spoke with Louise alone because he did not want any witnesses; Wilhelm I spoke with Napoleon III alone because he did not want to humiliate him before the others; the Castle of Wilhelms Heights near Kasel was offered to the ruler of the French as a provisional dwelling-place. His army was to be treated as prisoners of war.

Everyone had expected that now the war would come to an end; Napoleon was captured, Sedan had fallen. The path to the heart of France lay open. But they were mistaken. On the 4th day of September the Republic was declared in Paris, and all France united anew in patriotic enthusiasm. Paris was provisioned, its walls were strengthened anew and manned by a national guard. All through the provinces, forces of revenge nerved themselves to the uttermost, and later came the days of the bath of blood at Metz, and the surrender of Strassburg. Before this the tornado of civilized warfare had many times been overstepped by the despairing Frenchmen. From the uprising of the French Tireurs, which in itself was a truly patriotic movement, developed a dangerous class of footpads and assassins, who without any outward badge of authority demanded the protection of neutral inhabitants in order to fall upon the foreign soldiers murderously and treacherously. Old men, boys and women went together on this hunt for human beings, a scourge upon the land.

By the 15th of September the advance guards of both armies were within three hours of Paris and had encircled the city. A sortie of the French under Decrot was repulsed. An interview of the French Minister of Foreign Relations, Favre, with Bismarck, brought no results. The time of difficulty began for both parties. Not only did the besieged learn of the horrors of anarchy, but even the victorious army underwent a period of heavy trials during the struggle around Paris.

The cold of December was a great hardship for the people in Bivouac, for most of the dwellings had been razed. All eyes were upon Bismarck, who, at this time, was putting the finishing touches to a gigantic masterpiece. Even though there was no further glory of war to be won, still one had yet to experience the moment which contained the cream of all true patriots and which was to bring to the Fatherland greatness and peace: the union of Germany, which found outward expression in the crowning of the Emperor at Versailles on the 18th of January, 1871.

In the glass gallery of this stronghold of the Bourbons the proud figures of the German commanders and princes grouped themselves about the noble figure of the Emperor Wilhelm. Next to him stood the Paladins of the young empire: Bismarck, Moltke and Roon.

THE BRIDGE THAT FAILED (Three parts—Jan. 1).—John Sanders, a noted bridge builder, has received an order from the government to construct a steel bridge in the place of an old rope structure over a swiftly running river. He instructs his engineers, Jack Welder and Frank Sawyer, to prepare plans for the bridge. Jack begins to work on his plans immediately and makes rapid progress with the designs, but Frank, who is of an indolent character, is unable to produce anything worth while. Seeing the progress which Jack has made, Frank becomes envious and determines to secure his plans if possible. They are both rivals for the hand of the ironmaster's daughter, Ruth, but Jack is the favored lover, which is another thorn in the side of Frank. Some time after, the government engineers call at the steel mills to discuss the plans for the new bridge. Stealing away unnoticed, Frank secretly traces Jack's plans, intending to submit them as his own. But in order to do this it is necessary for him to get his rival out of the way. Chancing to find a huge knife while going through the steel works, a treacherous plan suggests itself. He pockets the knife, intending to use it when the opportunity presented itself.

Several days later, he sees Jack crossing the old foot bridge and determines to wreak vengeance on him. He cuts the rope cables which hold the bridge, sending Jack down into the seething waters below. He then hastens to the steel works and reports that the bridge has collapsed and that Jack had gone down with it. He goes to the office to destroy the original plans of Jack, but is seen by one of the employees. Hearing of her lover's plight, Ruth rushes to the high bank of the river and, balancing herself for a moment, makes a spectacular dive into the rushing waters below. She swims to the side of Jack, who is fast becoming exhausted by his efforts to keep afloat. They are then taken into a boat which had set out after them, and return to the ironmaster's home, where Jack is revived. He then accuses Frank of treacherously cutting the bridge cables. Frank is also accused of destroying the plans and is led away to his just deserts.

A. BLINKHORN.

THE FIRST IRISH NATIONAL PILGRIMAGE TO LOURDES (General Film Agency, Ltd.—2 parts).—The Irish Pilgrimage to Lourdes has been described as "the act of a nation." Beyond all question it was the act of a nation for practically every man, woman and child in Ireland interested himself or herself in the project from the moment it was first discussed a year ago. The Most Rev. Dr. McHugh, Bishop of Derry, whose portrait appears in the film, was its moving spirit, and the undertaking, colossal to such a country as Ireland, was carried through, by dint of hard work, much personal economy, and a superabundance of faith, to a complete and happy conclusion. It should be borne in mind that a pilgrimage from Ireland to Lourdes was a far more difficult undertaking than a pilgrimage from any other part of the continent. The business of transporting the sick from Ireland to England, followed by a long and tedious journey to London, the second sea trip across the channel, and, finally, the weary train journey from the very north of France to the Pyrenees must have taxed the endurance of the sick to the uttermost. The safe transport of over 3,000 pilgrims under these conditions was in itself a veritable triumph of organization.

Some of the most affecting scenes shown in the film are those at Victoria Station and at Folkstone. The pilgrims had left Dublin the night before, and are breaking their journey in London for a hurried breakfast, which is snatched on the station itself. London policemen are carrying littlers, and cheerful porters, having turned nurses for the time being, are tenderly rendering invaluable assistance. The station is shrouded in the peculiar gloom of a London morning, and yet the blend of Celtic cheerfulness and Saxon readiness for emergencies, renders the atmosphere far from oppressive.

At Folkstone porters and policemen have given place to brown-faced sailors, careful and anxious bearers of the sick and crippled.

We will pass over the rest of the journey until we reach Lourdes, full of charm and scented with the sweet air of the Pyrenees. Here we are mere units in the crowds of pilgrims all hurrying to the great objectives, the Basilica and the Grotto. A night's rest, and then commences the real business of the Pilgrimage, which lasts three days. There is a first day's procession to the great white Basilica, the unveiling of a stately Celtic Cross by Cardinal Logue, and visits to the Grotto, where Bernadette first saw the sacred apparitions. A visit has also to be paid to the little gabled house where she lived.

Most important of all, however, is the Procession of the Blessed Sacrament. This solemn and awe-inspiring scene, when a wonderful vista is given to the Basilica, and of the long, serried lines of the pilgrims, before whom are laid the sufferers in their litters, is an unforgetable sight. Nothing like this has ever been brought to the eyes of those who know Lourdes only as a name, and it should be remembered that this procession was never taken before His Eminence Cardinal Logue gave express permission to the General Film Agency, Ltd., to take it. Possibly the pictures which will arouse the greatest public interest are those which appear at the end of the film and show the miraculous cures. The names are given. Grace Maloney, the Killaloe girl, who was cured and her bent leg straightened, so that she now walks like any other fine-limbed Irish Coleen. Patrick Casey, who left home absolutely helpless, and who left his crutches at Lourdes, and also Miss B. J. McDonogh, Cabragh, Co. Sligo, who suffered from a diseased bone in the left foot.

AMBROSIO.

SATAN'S CASTLE (2 parts—Dec. 27).—A mountaineer, in relating to some travelers the legends of his country, tells them the story of the somber castle in which they are interested.

"Many years ago a soldier of fortune having lost in gambling his last possession—his sword—sat brooding over his situation. An unexpected friend came to his aid, for Satan, always on the alert to gain a new victim, tempted him with his wiles, and the soldier, dazzled by the alluring prospects, signed the contract given him, thus giving himself up to the devil. Satan was generous. The poor soldier was made a Baron and master of this beautiful castle, wherein he found merry companions.

"Their days and nights were spent in wild revels. One day two strolling minstrels attracted their attention, and they were summoned into the castle. The young girl danced, while her companion played, and so pleased was the Baron with her that he kept the dancer with him against her will. When her comrade tried to defend her he was rudely chased away.

"The Baron was the terror of his tenants. From his humble abode one of the peasants, unable to pay his tithe, fearfully set out on his way to the castle in company with Charles, his daughter Mary's betrothed. Charles, however, was rudely turned out and the peasant threatened with a long whipping, if, in ten days' time his debt was not paid. The day set arrived, but the peasant, still unable to pay the money, received the punishment warned him. He was again allowed an extension of a few days, but without result, and the Baron set forth for the peasant's home. Mary, the beautiful daughter, implored him to be lenient with her father, and the wicked man, attracted by her pleas, had her seized and carried away to his home, in payment of the debt. Charles saw his fiancée dragged away and vowed to save and avenge her.

"Tired of the Baron's oppression, the peasants arose in arms against him. During the night, in their boats, they stealthily glided along the lake bordering the castle, and successfully scaled the wall, supposed to be out of reach. The sleeping guards were overpowered, but the Baron, enjoying himself after his supper, was ignorant of his approaching fate.

"Mary was ordered into his presence, and the young girl advanced with hesitating steps. By a powerful effort she succeeded in freeing herself from his embrace just as Charles and his followers burst into the room.

"The Baron was locked in the room and the castle set on fire. Vainly he sought for a means of escape from the quickly spreading flames. His anguish was at its highest when Satan, a creditor who does not forgive a debt, again appeared with the contract to claim his victim, and together they descended into purgatory. At a safe distance from the burning castle Mary and Charles were united in marriage.

"And now, during stormy nights, the soul of the wicked Baron haunts the castle walls." Thus ends the story of the mountaineer.

FEDORA (Four parts—Dec. 25).—Lord Herstell is seated in the Cafe Chantant with his friends watching the famous dancers, when a note is brought to him, saying that Nellie, the daughter of John Channing, a commoner, whom he has abandoned, is dead, and that she had left a child named Fedora. John Channing writes to Lord Herstell that he does not want aid from him, and that he is leaving the city at once, taking little Fedora with him. Lord Herstell overcome with remorse, bids his friends good night, and starts for the house of John Channing, which he finds deserted.

Six months later, while coming home from the club, Lord Herstell hears a cry of a child. A baby is discovered with a note pinned to its dress asking whoever finds the child should take care of him, for the sake of his unfortunate mother. Lord Herstell decides to adopt this baby in the place of Fedora.

Twenty-five years later, Robert Herstell grown to manhood, is ignorant of the fact that he is not Lord Herstell's son. Lord Herstell, in financial difficulties, risks the remainder of his banknotes on a horse race, and loses all. He is threatened that unless he agrees to join a band of anarchists, he will be ruined by parties holding his notes for a large sum of money. Lord Herstell consents to join the band. He is taken to the meeting-place of the anarchists. After Lord Herstell has signed and taken the vow of allegiance, the place is attacked by the police, and a terrific battle takes place. A number of anarchists escape, Lord Herstell among them, but as he is running away, he loses his seal. He climbs over a roof and jumps down into a boat in the river, and finally arrives home. The police, in the meantime, have found the seal. Lord Herstell discovering the loss of his seal, writes a note to his adopted son, telling him of the circumstances, of his adoption, also enclosing the note which was pinned to Robert's dress when he was found. As the detectives arrive to arrest Lord Herstell, he ends his life.

Robert changes his name, and becomes a reporter. In the meantime, Fedora, grown up, becomes a famous actress. Robert goes to interview her in the capacity of a reporter, and falls in love with her. He becomes a frequent visitor at her house and theater. A very wealthy man, John Dormer, is also in love with Fedora, and one night John Dormer is refused admission into Fedora's dressing-room, while Robert is admitted. At a meeting of the Rivoli Club, John Dormer denounces Robert and tells the guests that Robert is the son of Lord Herstell, who was mixed up in the anarchists' plot, and committed suicide. There is a bitter quarrel between the two rivals, and Robert slaps Dormer. A duel is fought, and Robert is wounded.

In the meantime, Fedora, knowing that she is the daughter of Lord Herstell, believes that Robert, the man she loves, is her brother. She hears that he has been wounded, goes to him and tells the doctors that she will nurse him. In his room she finds some papers, and is convinced that Robert is Lord Herstell's son. When Robert is nearly well, she is so much in love with him that she decides to take real poison in the act where she is supposed to take poison, to end her unhappiness. She writes a note before the show starts, telling Robert that she is the daughter of Lord Herstell, and being that a brother and sister cannot marry, she is going to end her life at the show in which she is playing tonight. On the envelope of the letter she puts a memorandum for her servant, telling him not to mail this letter until the next morning.

As the servant enters and arranges his desk, he spills ink on the desk, and over the letter, blurring the memorandum and leaving the name and address only. The servant, thinking that the letter has been forgotten, mails it. When Robert receives it and reads its contents, he immediately goes to the theater where Fedora is playing. As she is about to take poison, Robert staggers to the stage and is in the nick of time to prevent her from swallowing the drug. When the excitement is over, Robert tells Fedora that he is only an adopted son of Lord Herstell's. The production closes with Robert and Fedora enjoying their honeymoon in a villa in southern Italy.

WARNER'S FEATURES.

A WAIF OF THE PLAINS (Three parts).—Westward ho! orward ride the pioneers, penetrating further into the land of the buffalo and the hostile Indians. A halt is called and the settlers' wives band together to prepare the noonday meal. Here follows a picturesque scene between two children of the camp, showing their strong affection for each other. The boy carves their initials upon a buffalo's tooth and hangs it about his playmate's neck. An hour later the camp is in ruins and Standing Elk, a brave of the attacking band of Indians, has carried off Baby Early, thinking her to be the sole survivor. The boy, Ray Myers, recovers consciousness just as a detachment of Uncle Sam's soldier boys arrive upon the scene and some time later, after his health is restored, he becomes the pal of the big boys in blue. Sixteen years pass by and the little girl adopted by Standing Elk has grown into a beautiful young woman. The boy, now Lieutenant Myers, encounters her alone and realizing that white blood courses in her veins, induces her to escape from the Indian camp. She is pursued, but outdistances her captors only to fall when her pony stumbles. Myers rushing to meet her discovers the buffalo's tooth about her neck just as he is made a prisoner by the Indians. The picture closes with a powerful scene showing Standing Elk giving his life that he may assist the lovers to escape by drawing the pursuers in the opposite direction after exchanging clothes with Lieutenant Myers.

THE MOVIE QUEEN (Three parts).—Sylvia, a poor seamstress, lives with her little sister in a boarding-house. A wealthy woman fascinated by her beauty obtains a position for her with a motion picture producing company. Her talent is noticed and she soon becomes a leading lady. Sylvia plays the title role in "Cinderella." Jenny, another star, is jealous of Sylvia's sudden rise to fame. The director of the motion picture company obtains permission from Count Sivry's butler to take a few scenes on his estate. In departing, Sylvia leaves behind one of her slippers. To regain Sylvia's friendship, Jenny invites her to her home. She also invites Mr. Piccolini, the director. Jenny leaves Sylvia with Piccolini. Piccolini takes advantage of their seclusion and attempts to make love to her. Angered she leaves Jenny's home, and the next day severs her connection with the motion picture company to take up her old occupation of seamstress. Count Sivry returns home, finds a dainty slipper which arouses in him a desire to meet the owner face to face. He goes to a theater and as fate would have it Cinderella is shown. He recognizes the scenes taken on his grounds, which explain the lost slipper. The millionaire bachelor falls in love with the beautiful Cinderella and at once sets out to meet her. At the studio he is informed that she is no longer with them. He calls at her home, but Sylvia mistakes his designs and refuses assistance. However, love will always find a way. With the help of Sylvia's landlady the count is successful in bringing about a meeting. Like the fairy tale, Sylvia marries the charming count and her little sister finds a new home.

REBECCA THE JEWESS

From Sir Walter Scott's Work

IVANHOE

The play opens in the reign of Richard I, when the Saxon and Danish population lay groaning under the iron heel of the All-Conquering Norman. Richard, the only man of his race, represented by the Saxons, is believed to be still a prisoner on the continent, and the country is most evilly ruled by Prince John. Cedric, one of the few Saxon nobles allowed to retain his estate, desires to marry his ward, Rowena, to Athelstane, "The Unready," the last representative of the old Saxon Kings, hoping to see them, in time, on the throne of their forefathers and the Norman invader driven from the land.

COMEDY SCENARIO EDITORS!

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company is centering its mightiest effort on making the best comedies in the world. If you have a good position now, a position that HAS A GOOD FUTURE FOR YOU, we do not care to take you away from it. But whenever you want to make a change for the better and join the staff of THE BIGGEST AND STRONGEST CONCERN IN THE WORLD OF PICTURES, think of the Universal first. The instant you are free to do so, LET US HEAR FROM YOU.

It ought to be plain to everyone by this time that no film concern in the universe has the vim and vigor and determination and enterprise and ambition that inspires the Universal. That is the kind of concern that you ought to be connected with, IF YOU ARE GOOD ENOUGH IN YOUR LINE. We've never failed in anything we've attempted and we don't intend to fail in our determination to BEAT THE WHOLE WORLD WITH COMEDIES just as we now beat the whole world with dramatic productions, features and general excellence of program.

We are ALWAYS on the market for the BEST MEN IN EVERY LINE OF THE BUSINESS. But most particularly just now, we want those who are high up in the COMEDY end of the trade. The opportunity of a lifetime is knocking at your door right now as you read this advertisement. THE PHANTOSCOPE

Why does the Phantoscope project large pictures using standard film, taking current only from an incandescent lamp socket? Because it's different.

Why was it singled out for recognition by a scientific society, the judging committee embracing eminent mechanical engineers? Because new principles are involved.

Why is no booth required by the fire authorities in those cities where it has already been submitted for test? Because film left standing in the light indefinitely will not ignite.

Why don't you send today for a Phantoscope? It's probably because, not yet having seen it, you can't believe it is true.

Find out for yourself:—Mail us a $5 deposit and ask us to send a Phantoscope C.O.D. privilege of examination.

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and anyone can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact, they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of $3.50 we will send, by parcel post, prepaid and insured, the following:

24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address:

UTILITY TRANSPARENCY CO.
1733 West 9th St. Brooklyn, N. Y.

J-M Transite Asbestos Wood Booths

Absolutely fireproof. Prevent noise of machine from disturbing audience. Cannot become electrically charged or grounded.

J-M Booths conform to all the requirements of state and municipal regulations, insurance authorities and inspection departments wherever ordinances compel the use of a fire-proof booth.

Furnished in portable and permanent types. Write our nearest Branch for "J-M Theatre Necessities" Booklet.

GUIL PASTILS

On account of a 10% reduction in the tariff on my last consignment, the price is reduced to $1. E. E. Fulton, of Chicago, has just placed an order for 1,200 Pastils, to be used with his new "Economic Gas Outfit," which, using Guil Pastils, will save gas users many dollars. Whether you use chemicals or tanks, they will give you a far better light than limes. Dealers write for new prices.

Service To You. Ten Cents a Day

The Only Automatic Electric Ticket Issuing and Registering Machine On the Market. No Expert Knowledge Required To Operate It ! !

A slight pressure on the keys, and instantly 1, 2, 3, 4, or 5 tickets of one or two prices will issue from the slot, the machine will count them, register them and deliver them right into the hands of your patrons. After each operation the electricity is automatically cut off.

No Ticket can be issued through the slot without recording it against the cashier.

The tickets and machinery hang under the counter; there is nothing in sight but the top plate. The ticket container will hold 4000 tickets in one continuous strip.

Our machine will handle a crowd in half the time required by hand selling.

YOU TAKE NO RISK IN USING OUR MACHINE. We guarantee satisfaction. If the machine breaks down, we will send you another one.

OUR PLAN: We will rent you a single or double machine at $3.00 per month, payable 3 months in advance, and furnish tickets. We charge no more for tickets than any other first class ticket makers. We make machines to handle your business. Order today.

Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

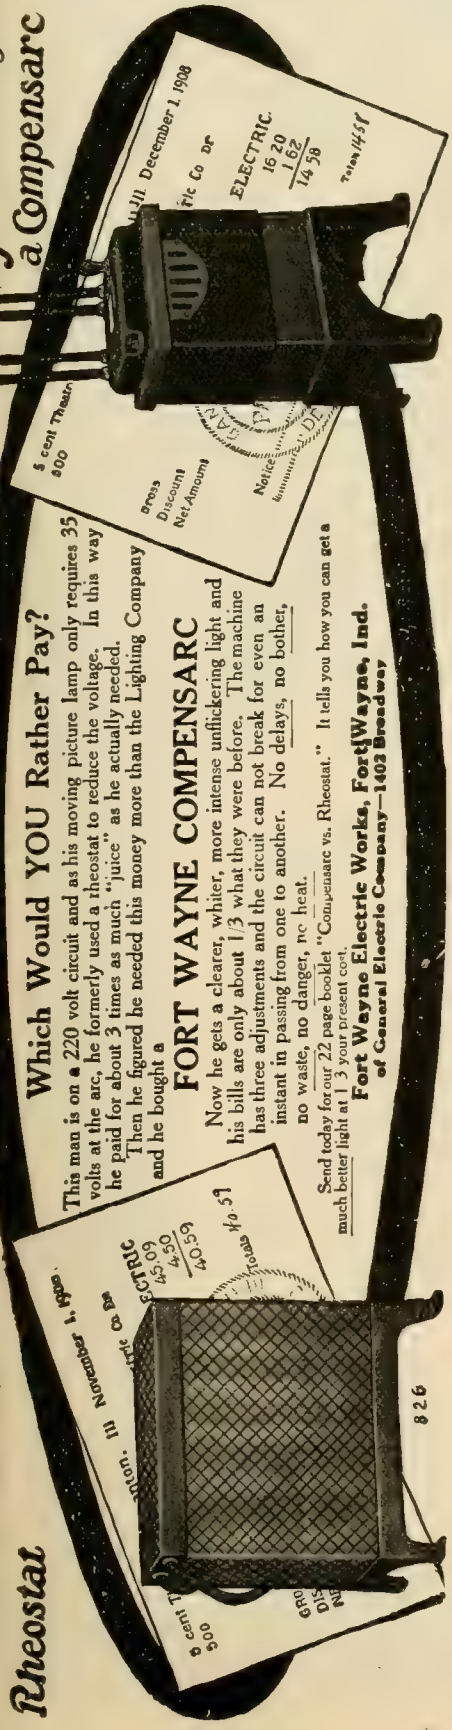
After he bought a Compensarc



Which Would YOU Rather Pay?

This man is on a 220 volt circuit and as his moving picture lamp only requires 35 volts at the arc, he formerly used a rheostat to reduce the voltage. In this way he paid for about 3 times as much "juice" as he actually needed.
Then he figured he needed this money more than the Lighting Company and he bought a

FORT WAYNE COMPENSARC

Now he gets a clearer, whiter, more intense unflickering light and his bills are only about 1/3 what they were before. The machine has three adjustments and the circuit can not break for even an instant in passing from one to another. No delays, no bother, no waste, no danger, no heat.

Send today for our 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat." It tells you how you can get a much better light at 1/3 your present cost.

Merry Christmas

Selig Contributions Commenced Last Week with the Greatest Series of Wild Animal Pictures Ever Presented

The Selig Regular Service will continue to present its patrons with good things in variety that mean easy money for the manager and solid satisfaction for the general public right along through the coming year.

"UNTO THE THIRD AND FOURTH GENERATION"

A play that has its picturesque beginning in English country life two centuries ago and then flashes up-to-date, showing how the strain of blood will tell, particularly as it pertains to weakness in looking at the wine cup. An interesting and attractive play with a fine moral.

In Two Reels. Released January 5th

January 6th "THE LIVING WAGE"

An up-to-date romance, dealing with industrial conditions where dollars and cents figure first and sense with sentiment comes as a triumphant finale of right or wrong.

January 7th "BY UNSEEN HAND"

A Western story with an exceedingly ingenious turn, dealing with the mysterious death of one man who has been threatened by another. The cause of the tragedy is due to a sunglass, which explodes the cartridge in a belt that has been left carelessly upon the table.

January 8th "PIETRO, THE PIANIST"

A comedy based upon the sensitiveness of a musical temperament has a universal appeal for fun as every community has some genius that exaggerates art, making it amusing, instead of serious. How this fake pianist is "smoked out" furnishes a corking story.

January 9th "ON THE BREAST OF THE TIDE"

Fisherfolk have their troubles, and Big Jim's is a black bottle with fiery liquor therein. He breaks himself of the habit by marooning himself on an island, and as a reward for his triumph, he rescues his own child from the sea.

N.B.—Get our new poinsettia three-sheet for one-sheet insert—the most colorful display for front of the house ever devised. It has all the warmth, color and beauty of the Christmas spirit.

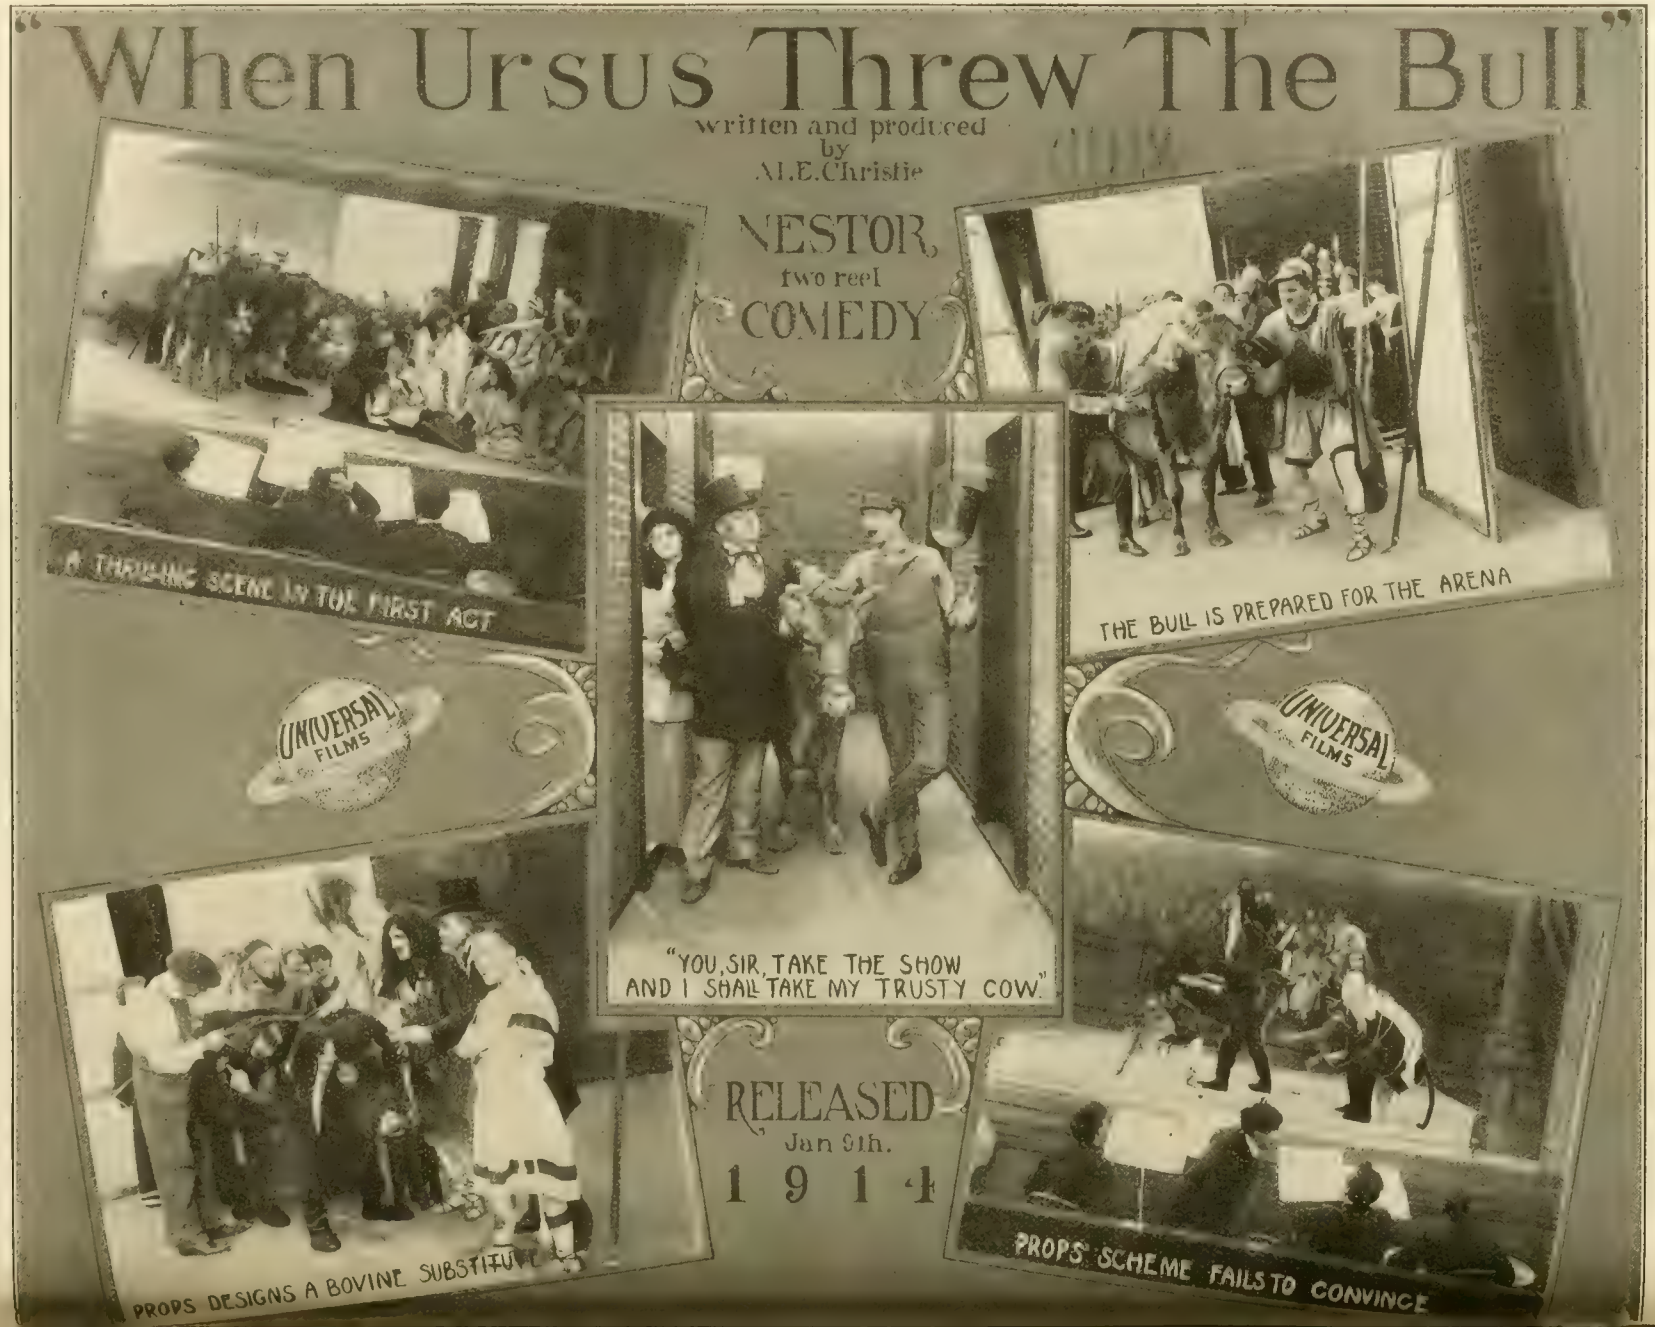
A TWO-REEL BURLESQUE OF "QUO VADIS"



Two solid reels of hysterics! Two reels of the screamingest fun ever snapped by a moving picture camera. Two reels that caused the dignified Board of Censors to double up with laughter. The kind of comedy you have prayed for. The kind we have been working our heads off to give you. You haven't a minute to lose before ordering your one and three and six sheet posters and all your other advance advertising. Not only the timeliest but the best burlesque we have ever seen. Take our word for it and arrange immediately for "WHEN URSUS THREW THE BULL."

King Baggot's Greatest Work—"ABSINTHE"

Four reels. Released Jan. 22nd. Made in Paris with King Baggot and Miss Leah Baird in the leading roles, directed by Herbert Brenon and supported by a superb French company. Your exchange will have to charge you extra rental for this. Don't quibble. No matter what you have to pay it will be a terrific money maker for you! Get all your advertising ready!

"THE MERCHANT OF VENICE" Coming Soon

(Special Release)

Another four reel feature in which we use our entire enormous equipment and outfit on our great big ranch. This is the most beautiful Shakespearean picture ever made by any company in the world at any time. The cost of production was so terrific that we will have to charge the exchanges more than the usual price. This means that you, too, will have to pay more. We could make five times the profit by selling it on the state rights plan, but we're going to sell it to the regular Universal exchanges, nevertheless! If you're a Universal exhibitor you're lucky!

UNIVERSAL FILMS TRADE MARK

Our Resolution

DURING the past year, the Eclectic Film Company has released some of the most notable feature productions ever before shown, films which will for a long time to come be remembered as real gems of the motion picture art. Some of these are acknowledged by competent critics to be unapproached for dramatic rendition, refined action, splendid photography, and exquisite coloring.

¶ Consistent with the policy which we have pursued in the past, we will continue to release the very finest feature films to be procured, sparing neither money nor effort to obtain them. You will do well to see that you are among those who will reap the benefit of a close acquaintance with the entire line of Eclectics, thereby assuring yourself of a prosperous year.

The Bridge That Failed

(Copyrighted)

Three Parts Now Ready

A wonderfully gripping photoplay. Insanely jealous, an engineer plans the death of his rival. He severs the cables of a bridge, sending his rival into the raging waters below. His sweetheart makes a spectacular dive from the river bank and rescues the drowning man. A number of sensational features make this a most extraordinary film. Be sure you don't miss it.

The House of Mystery

(Copyrighted)

Four Parts Natural Coloring Ready Jan. 10th

One of those powerful detective stories which are so popular. A banker is the victim of a series of mysterious thefts. He calls in a noted detective to unravel the mystery. The subsequent happenings will keep you in a constant state of tremor. Baffled at every turn, the detective finally succeeds in running the robber band to earth. Then it is found that the banker's daughter-in-law was held prisoner by the mysterious band, the head of which had impersonated her and systematically robbed the financier.

We are preparing for early release a film of exceptional worth, one which is bound to put you in an enviable position if you succeed in securing it.

The Famous American Favorite

JOHN BARRYMORE

In The Franco-Continental Romantic Comedy

"AN AMERICAN CITIZEN"

By Katherine Lucette Rigby

A made-to-order marriage, a sudden change of nationality, and a thousand complications that begin with a laugh and end with another. A play full of comic tragedies.

RELEASED IN FOUR REELS, JANUARY 10th

A romance of comic intrigues and humorous disasters, with just enough seriousness to make it human. John Barrymore is irresistible as the patriotic American, the famous characterization created by Nat Goodwin.

EDITORIAL

THE GLORY OF WORK

The history of the world is an eternal monument to the labor of man. Many of its chapters were written with cold steel and blood amid sorrows and dangers, but throughout, it is a history of deeds.

What is the goal of man's endeavors? What the purpose of our struggles? All the days of our lives we strive incessantly—for what?

We sometimes think that we labor only because we need or desire money. But the soldier does not march out upon the battlefield, facing danger and death, for his monthly wage. Nor does the hope of glory inspire his courage. No genuine hero ever thinks of the fame his act will earn.

We strive essentially for accomplishment. Work requires no other inspiration than itself. The thrill of creation, the ecstasy of development, are their own incentives.

The history of the motion picture, like the history of the world, is founded upon endeavor and achievement.

"AN AMERICAN CITIZEN" THE REPETITION OF A GREAT SUCCESS!

The venerable expression, "History repeats itself," has found a new significance in the productions of the Famous Players, which repeat in motion pictures the history of the oral drama's greatest successes.

John Barrymore, one of the most popular favorites of the American stage, in "An American Citizen," the famous comedy success in which Nat Goodwin scored one of his greatest triumphs, is supplied with numerous opportunities to display his expressive and inimitable abilities. We venture to presume that Mr. Barrymore will secure in this humorous characterization the same sensational degree of success that attended "The Fortune Hunter," the titular role of which he created.

"An American Citizen" is a delightfully human drama of adventures and misadventures, fortunes and misfortunes. It portrays an exciting trans-continental romance, in which any number of comic complications centre about a young American, who, in the midst of his defeats and victories, never forgets his patriotism.

John Barrymore, in the role of Beresford Cruger, who chivalrously sacrifices nationality, love and fortune and faces all his reverses with a never-say-die fortitude typically American, adds an artistic pantomimic achievement to his list of stellar triumphs.

GOSSIP

Notice how popular the idea of presenting famous players in noted plays has become? The Famous Players Film Company, the pioneer concern in this field, has lately been tendered what is known as "the best flattery" quite frequently.

PARSONS BOOKED FOR LIFE

Grover Cleveland Parsons found booking the "30 Famous Features" in the States of Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia and D. C. such a very easy task, that, not being contented with the sweet desuetude of a peaceful mind, he slipped away last Saturday with Miss Mary Anastasia Driscoll, of Baltimore, and visited Saint Patrick's Church in Washington. Parsons entered into the contract for life almost as enthusiastically as he did for the Famous Players product. Long life and happiness!

The surest sign of success in the film business is the ticket seller's smile. Did you ever pass by a theatre exhibiting the "30 Famous Features"? No, impossible—but you might have noticed it as you walked in.

"George Kleine Attractions"

We shall impress it upon you—that phrase—until YOU and every theatre owner in America is cognizant of its importance, value and meaning—

"George Kleine Attractions"

Include those Master-works you already know, as

"QUO VADIS?"
"THE LAST DAYS OF POMPEII"
"ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA"

and many others of which you shall soon hear—varying in length, period and type of story—but varying not one iota from the tremendous standard we have already established.

Stop and consider—remember your many weak programs of the past year—the careless, haphazard stories, poorly photographed, indifferently well acted. The initial multiple-reel subjects of a year ago were "Winners"—they were a novelty, and the public came.

And Now We Offer You A NOVELTY That Will ENDURE. That's not a paradox. Five, Six and Eight Reels will attract—Back them up with QUALITY—Photographic, Histrionic and in Theme—and you will have backed a "Winner."

If the man who coined the word "Movie" had seen "QUO VADIS?" first, that word would never have joined the influences that work against the better interests of this industry. No just man can sit through "QUO VADIS?" without reverence and respect for the power that made it possible. That's art in its highest and best form. That's what makes the fame of Cellini, Shakespeare and Michel Angelo ENDURE through the ages.

Just as "QUO VADIS?" will ENDURE, so shall "THE LAST DAYS OF POMPEII," "ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA," and all those other subjects which we shall dignify by the classification of "GEORGE KLEINE ATTRACTIONS."

During 1914 we shall place upon the American market the Highest Type of Motion Photography Subjects that Brains and Money Can Provide. In Addition to the Output of Our Own Studios in Turin, Italy, We Shall Scour the Continent for the Product of Others. Quality, and Only QUALITY, shall be the deciding factor.

GEORGE KLEINE

166 N. State Street CHICAGO, ILL.

A discharged employee is accused of the death of the manufacturer. A baffling mystery story in which time andjustice disentangle the knotty chain of circumstantial evidence.

KLEINE-CINES

(In Two Parts)

"WHO WAS GUILTY"

(Copyright, 1913, by George Kleine)

For Release Tuesday, January 20, 1914

Van Luin, owner of a large factory, discharges Jose, a workman, and Jose leaves, swearing vengeance. James Holcomb, manager of the factory, is both hopelessly in love and in debt, and schemes to recoup his losses before he marries Madeline. That night Van Luin, carrying a large sum of money, starts for his country estate.

The next morning, Jose staggers home quite drunk, his clothing clotted with blood. He carries the blood-stained whip of Van Luin. With the evidence all against him, Jose is convicted of Van Luin's murder. Maryston, a detective, convinced of Jose's innocence, unravels the mystery.

Maryston finds on a blotting pad the impression of a letter Holcomb has written to his sweetheart. With this slender thread, he constructs a rope of proof strong enough to hang Holcomb.

An enchanting detective story, so staged that you do not know until the last scene "who was guilty." Beautifully photographed, and splendidly acted by the CINES Company of Rome, Italy.

Book "Who Was Guilty." You will want it.

Charles Klein's Greatest Achievement

"The Lion and the Mouse"

in Six Reels

THROUGH THE OFFICES OF THE GENERAL FILM COMPANY

There was never a more successful author and playwright than Mr. Chas. Klein, and in securing exclusive rights to reproduce all of his great dramas in motion picture form, Lubin has again demonstrated that he is determined that all of the best pictures must come from Lubin.

"The Lion and the Mouse" had a more extended run in New York theatres than any drama of recent years—the best proof of its popularity.

Special Actors and Actresses of widespread reputation were employed to depict the exacting roles. Gorgeous stage settings were built exclusively for this production, and the photography, if possible, excels that of anything yet produced by Lubin.

Facts and Comments

IT is reported that in a neighboring Jersey town a church had to close its doors because of the competition of a motion picture theater in the same block. Many inferences may be drawn from this fact, and none of them unfavorable to the motion picture. The eloquence of the screen may have proved more convincing and more entertaining than the eloquence of the pulpit. It may have been a case of a survival of the fittest, or it may have been nothing more than a reflection and an effect of local sentiment. At all events the fact must increase our respect for an institution which is a successful rival both of the theater and of the church.

Quite significant in connection with this triumph of the motion picture is the attitude of a body of clergymen toward the great religious picture "From the Manger to the Cross." As reported in the newspapers, these reverend gentlemen looked at the picture and assumed a position of doubt and disapproval. If the pastor of the closed church in West Orange belonged to this class of clergymen the closing of his church because of the rivalry of a motion picture theater becomes perfectly clear. He is standing perfectly still while the world all around him is moving forward. He is waiting for the world to come back to him. He is living in the age of the canal-boat and is annoyed at the fast express thundering by and interfering with his somnolent meditations. A safe way to get at a man's sympathy with human progress is to test him on his attitude toward the motion picture.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD is highly gratified at the energetic action on the part of the authorities against the white slave films, both in New York and in many other cities. The situation proves once more that we need no censorship and no previous restraint to keep objectionable films off the screen. The existing law is quite sufficient. It is extremely distasteful to us to see the police interfere with exhibitions of motion pictures, but for the abatement of a grave and harmful nuisance prompt action on the part of the officials seems to be the best method. The injury which these productions have done to the good name of the motion picture is difficult to estimate, but it has not been small. As far as we know, none of these objectionable films have been exhibited in regular motion picture theaters, their promoters have exploited the salacious filth in places where the motion picture is only an occasional attraction or where it is forced into an unwelcome proximity with bad and indifferent vaudeville.

It was perfectly refreshing to see Judge Gavegan in the New York Supreme Court brush aside the flimsy and miserable pretense of the "moral lesson" of these so-called "white slave films." He made it very plain to the attorneys for the promoters that he saw through their scheme of exploitation, and at once vacated and set aside the temporary injunction which had been granted to restrain the police from interfering with this morbid and degrading exhibition. The Justice then reserved his decision on the application to grant a permanent injunction against the police authorities. He did this probably with a view of preventing the promoters of the objectionable shows from going into another judicial department and getting an injunction there. No injunction would, of course, be granted by any other judge in this state while the matter in dispute is being considered by judicial authority in this city. All the guns of these promoters of white slave films have, therefore, been spiked and the atmosphere has been cleared considerably. These "Social Research" film companies and "moral feature companies," so willing and anxious to improve mankind at a twenty-five-cent admission, will now probably go a bit slower and show a little more respect for public opinion. Aside from all other considerations, this case has again proved our contention that we need no censorship and that the present laws are quite ample to deal with objectionable films.

A RECENT decision of a lower criminal court in this city held that it is no violation of the law to have an unlicensed assistant run the projecting machine, provided it was done in the presence and under the supervision of a duly licensed operator. This decision is in line with similar action by the courts in other States where the law compels the employment of none but licensed operators. The reasoning is the same as in the case of licensed dentists or druggists, who may supervise and direct the work of an unlicensed employee if the licensing law is complied with in all other respects. Any other interpretation would expose the exhibitor and operator to petty persecution by the officials charged with the enforcement of the law.

The Best is Yet to Come

By Louis Reeves Harrison

EXASPERATING thing about the average adaptation of today is not that it is so bad, but that it falls short of being what the audience craves, often because it lacks the foremost element of success. It steals the corpse of a great novel, or of a great play, and dangles the pulseless thing before our eyes to the accompaniment of loud publicity blasts. "Behold this famous literary form!" "Gaze upon this masterly structure of the drama!" We watch it with the curiosity of seeing a mummy unwrapped, and wonder if the destiny of moving pictures is to be body-snatching as a fine art.

It may be safely assumed that the man who wrote the original work from which the adaptation is made had a message in mind and gave it form and treatment in accordance with the requirements of his time if not to suit himself at the moment, his main object being to "get over" his meaning with all the force at his command. Moving pictures can, however, more easily convey the message with entirely different form and treatment, can glorify a theme as an accomplished composer of piano music paraphrases a composition for orchestral performance, beautifying while making it more suitable for the new medium of interpretation.

There is something very amusing, when it is not pitiful, in the reverence accorded the "once was," in contrast with the small value placed on merit that is, by men engaged in furnishing screen stories to the people, in view of the fact that we, all of us, are the people, and we are constantly knocking lifeless releases on hackneyed subjects turned out by business rivals. The incessant activity of concerns turning out thousands of reel narratives every year has long ago covered everything within reach, and those who put out feature plays in 1914 will find that they must offer something bright, original and entertaining in form and treatment of theme or be relegated to that mediocrity from which it is more difficult to return than to be a successful newcomer in the field.

The man of theatrical bringing-up has recently entered the arena with all the chesty confidence of the bull who has been lord of his own pasture. He imagines that moving picture audiences, now numbering some ninety millions a week, in a country where education is being widely and rapidly extended, are to be enlightened if not enthralled by the advent of past performers in outworn roles. In purest friendship, without an atom of prejudice against the man of theatrical bringing up, I am of the opinion the millions who go to the picture show are principally interested in what the producer has to exhibit that is worth exhibiting on its own merits.

There is to be a question of brand involved. The house turning out the highest uniform quality of product is the one to make the deepest impress and reap the largest reward of established good will in the days yet to come. The finest themes are, of course, those which command universal acceptance, but these are not always possible—the treatment of theme therefore rises in importance, and it must be a treatment deserving intelligent attention and consideration, rather than one which has done service in other days through other mediums.

The main thing is to have something to say that will permit one imagination to kindle others and then to say it so delightfully, so powerfully or so clearly, as the case may be, that it will go straight to the minds of the people through their hearts or to their hearts through their minds.

The average adaptation of today falls short of being what the audience craves because it lacks the torch of imagination which lights up hearts and minds. We are given the form of drama without its spirit, because an attempt is made to incorporate in this new art of ours the methods of an older one, whereas, as Wainewright puts it, "no work of art can be tried otherwise than by laws deduced from itself." The motion picture expressions thus far most successful have invariably had what might be termed "native" sensibility and sincerity.

Now men of active minds and artistic tastes, who have studied interpretation of thought by action from a theatrical point of view, may largely benefit the production of moving pictures and their exhibition in many ways, especially when they bring along a superior gift of type selection, but they are liable to fall into the crucible of bitter experience from underestimation of the art. Instead of carrying us through a lot of dull scenes to exactly copy a novel or stage drama, thereby preserving the form at the expense of losing the essence, better preserve the soul of the original work and express it according to the methods of the new art "deduced from itself." "To know the vintage and quality of a wine one need not drink the whole cask."

The best that is yet to come will surely not be in the line of weak imitations of what has been done in some other form of some other art. It will be creative and independent in glimpsing the mysteries of passion and thought. There are plenty of delightful and splendid phases of life to be depicted in new and attractive guise. Playwrights will treat the New Art as a Goddess, whose majesty and beauty they must unfold to the eyes of millions.

All this may sound optimistic. I am perfectly aware that theatrical people believe the sun rises in Aristotle and sets in Times Square, that our playwrights depend upon the obvious for fear of being suspected of genius, that we are being harrowed with morbid vice plays exploiting the festering sores of society, but—perhaps this is a matter of temperament—it seems to me that the New Art is offering us an infinity of charm and beauty that will not be long disregarded. Let us herald the dawn of a brighter era even if we do not grasp its full significance.

Picture the chaos that existed before the printing press was invented, the dark ages of ignorance illumined now and then by a few torches, even the confusion and stupidity that existed long after the art of producing printed matter for reading was well-developed. How many of that time faintly guessed at the enlightenment to be wrought by diffusion of knowledge through books? How many of us guess the infinity of charm and beauty to be sown broadcast over the world by moving pictures? Is it not to be a means of expression for men of creative talent quite as much as a "good proposition" for those entirely concerned with the mess of pottage?

There is enough pottage to go round and feed the greedy besides—what is of deeper interest to those who provide the pottage is the pleasure they are to be afforded, not by ash carts filled with street sweepings and garbage, but by what is imaginative and entertaining, by the new forms fashioned from old ones, by those inventions of the creative mind which project all others into the charmed circle of the romantic, to foreshadowings of what the future holds in store in which the visible things of life are transmuted to glimpses of the invisible, the forces divine.

The Editor's Confession

By James L. Hoff

A TIME-HONORED tradition of the craft maintains that the "brains" of a newspaper find expression only in its text or reading pages. It has always been supposed that the record of human progress—the news—was set only in uniform type, emphasized by an occasional display heading to mark its degree of importance, and that in those reading pages was contained all the literary merit of which the publication could boast. This tradition has been accepted by the United States Post Office Department as truth, and official recognition thereof is recorded in various rulings of that Department requiring that a publication wishing to enjoy the privileges of second-class rates must contain a fair preponderance of "pure reading matter" in order to establish its claim to being a "newspaper."

There may be, and doubtless there are, many instances where all the news is found in the form of "pure reading matter." We have seen publications whose advertising pages were but a dreary waste. Some fields of human endeavor afford no opportunity for play of imagination. Not so the field of the motion picture. We have just passed a most pleasant period of several hours turning the advertising pages of The Moving Picture World, and here and now "take our hat off" to the little band of Optimistic Psychologists who are giving us valued assistance in the task of assembling and recording the news items which tell of the progress of this remarkable business: the making and marketing of motion pictures.

To explain that term, "optimistic psychologist": it has long since been accepted that a successful and expert writer of advertisements is a "psychologist," and to write an advertisement that will sell things requires large quantities of "optimism," to be doled out in varying portions according to the immediate needs. At any rate, it is more sounding that "publicity man," or the other hackneyed terms. So we say that much is coming to these Optimistic Psychologists for the part they are taking in writing the history of motion pictures.

To establish its literature is seldom the first thought of a new art. Foremost in the minds of its sponsors is the gaining of a competence—the taking of profits. Then, if the fruits of their labors be sufficiently encouraging, they give thought to embellishment. Thus we have seen the art of the motion picture pass through the various stages of development, taking on with each upward step some new sign of progress, not the least of which is improvement in the methods and forms of advertising. To grasp the fullness of this, one has but to turn back to the earlier volumes of The Moving Picture World and compare the advertisements of those days with those which may be found in its pages today. Then it was bald statements in bold type; arbitrary claims of superiority. Films were films then, and so eagerly was anything and everything snatched up that all one had to do was to announce the possession of a reel of pictures to be assured of a sale.

But all that has changed. With the development of the business, quantity has more than kept pace with quality, and to dispose of the first the maker is required to extol the last. With the improvement of the quality of the picture he has improved the quality of his advertising, and this has brought into the business, men especially fitted to write advertisements entertainingly and convincingly and to illustrate them pleasingly and artistically. Clever arguments, striking designs and ample space combine to make the advertising pages of The Moving Picture World an illustrated encyclopedia of information concerning the trade.

Look them over and you will discover the truth we wish to impress upon you: that the advertising pages of The World vie with its news pages in the dissemination of real news of the trade. There is a reason for this. To be effective an advertisement must be read; to insure its being read the writers of these advertisements have taken to printing genuine news in the space they are paying for. Splendid idea, since it enhances the value of that space and is more likely to produce substantial results for the firm, and that is what the expert advertising man is hired for.

Another thing these advertising writers—these Optimistic Psychologists—are doing: consciously or unconsciously they are raising the character of their announcements to a higher and a higher plane; if anything, just a little bit ahead of the product they advertise. Our belief is that they recognize the trend of public sentiment and are doing their part to educate the amusement-loving public to what it should desire, instead of pandering to the depravity of the few upon the "old showman's" principle of "giving the public what it wants." We know this is so because there is less and still less wielding of the censorial "blue pencil" in the advertising department of The Moving Picture World. There is one form of censorship that The World believes in—the kind that begins at home. An ounce of prevention will accomplish more than any number of censor boards, pound as hard as they like, and accomplish the desired result with less friction. So we add another credit to the Optimistic Psychologist.

There is also something to be said for the truthfulness of our advertising contributors. Considering the great temptation to "draw the long bow" that constantly assails the ad-writer, it is seldom that our advertising contributors are accused of misrepresentation. Usually, if you "see it in the 'ad,' it's so." In other words, their optimism does not run away with their better judgment.

Another point: nowhere is the progress of the motion picture business so accurately marked as in the advertising pages of The Moving Picture World. We say this without intent to boast, because it is due solely to the confidence of the trade in The World that it has become a veritable business barometer of that trade. As the volume of business has grown the advertising pages have increased; when times have been dull there has been a lull, but never a backward movement. Then, as though finding its second wind, there has been a leap forward and a new high mark has been established. We, who keep our fingers on the pulse of the trade, know when to expect these changes, but the phenomenon is, nevertheless, occasion for constant wonderment. This applies not alone to the trade as a whole but to the individual company as well, and it tells the story of progress often more accurately and convincingly than we could tell it in the news pages.

And there you have the editor's confession: that the advertising pages of The Moving Picture World are as interesting as any other page in it, which is another way of urging you to read them for the information they give; also, this is a deserved recognition of the painstaking efforts of the clever writers who are saying bright and impressive things about the pictures or the devices they seek to sell.

"Antony and Cleopatra"

A Magnificent Eight Part Photodrama by Cines, Soon to Be Presented by George Kleine in Leading Theaters Throughout This Country and Canada.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

HOW I wish I had beside me, as I write, the magic cup of Nektanebus, and that the marvellous chalice, in addition to its fabled occult powers, could bring before me the Alexandria and the Rome of "Antony and Cleopatra"; those august personages themselves; the days of courtly revel and the pageantry which marked their royal love, and the great sea fight at Actium that tolled the knell of the long, last sleep of the lovers in the magnificent mausoleum, in the Bruchium. I am consoled for the lack of the treasured vessel, however, by the presence of a still more potent and wondrous agency of modern evolution—the moving picture—which, in the able hands of Cines, has created anew, with remarkable fidelity, the scenes and the people of nearly two thousand years ago.

The self imposed task has been amazingly well done, when we remember the difficulties encountered in the reproduction of exterior and interior views of the magnificent architectural structures of Alexandria, as they appeared just before the Christian Era. It required great courage and enterprise, as well as ripe knowledge and skill, to lead us back to the royal palace of the Ptolemies, to the subterranean vaults of the Temple of Isis, and to the massive pylons of that beautiful city. But it required still more knowledge and imagination to create the atmosphere of the time, as reflected in manners, dress, furniture and the other one hundred and more requirements. The Cines people have succeeded admirably in this respect.

Superb scenes are the fall of Alexandria before Octavius; his triumphal entry afterwards at Rome; the landing of the Roman troops in Egypt by moonlight; the long and silent march to Alexandria; the Alexandrian pagents in which Antony and Cleopatra participated, and the great interior scene in the royal palace, on the night that was to be forever remembered.

What terrific battle scenes are shown on the lofty flight of steps leading up to the royal palace entrance, and on the Nile within the city! The carnage has all the show of blood and death. The Cines supernumeraries—and there are 3500 of them in the scene showing the fall of Alexandria—are really a marvellous force. Seldom, if ever, do they fail to do the right thing, in the right way, at the right time; and this, it must be remembered, is largely due to able direction.

In one particular I am of the opinion that the Cines people have failed to be sufficiently realistic. I refer to the fleet which leaves Ostia for Alexandria. Here was a fine opportunity to educate us by furnishing a variety of the vessels used in naval warfare at the time. No reading or intelligent man will believe for an instant that Octavius set out with a fleet of mere galleys, none of them with more than four or six oars. Why are we not given a glimpse of at least one trireme, with its three tiers of oarsmen, perhaps sixty in all? This would have been imposing as well as fitting. In this connection, I am glad to refer, with much praise, to the beautiful royal barge used by Cleopatra when she visits Antony's camp on the Cydnus. It fits in so well with the historic magnificence of her court and surroundings.

Just a word of praise for the master of properties. It would require far more knowledge than I have of such matters to appreciate fully the display of Roman Emblems used in that bewildering pageant which shows the triumphal march of the victorious Octavius through the streets of Rome. Their significance would require a small volume to describe. And so, all through the production, the same nice care and attention is bestowed on property details.

Nor must the Cines camera force be overlooked. Those beautiful moonlight effects, taken in the eye of the sun, in the afternoon of a cloudy day, with a veiled lens, are so convincing and artistic that one must cry "bravo!" I refer to the scenes showing the landing of the Roman troops in Egypt and to the showing of the beginning of their march to Alexandria. One of these scenes is finely tinted, and gives the effect of an exquisite and gigantic land and sea view in water colors.

The Story.

The story of "Antony and Cleopatra" is mainly based on Plutarch's narrative; but several scenes—notably those showing the voluptuous queen performing the dance du ventre before Antony, her cruel decision in having her woman slave cast into the pool as food for crocodiles, and the testing of subtle poisons on her men slaves—should be taken cum grano salis.

Such incidents cannot be reconciled with the devotion unto death of her two ladies in waiting, or with the tribute paid her by no less an authority than Horace, "non humilis mulier"—a woman capable of no baseness. When it is remembered that the Roman poet included this tribute in the hymn which he dedicated to Octavius, on his victory over Antony and Cleopatra, a denial of its truth must have been impossible at that very day. George Ebers, the great German archaeologist, scholar and author, referring to this tribute writes: "His words, which are equivalent to a deed, are among this greatly misjudged woman's fairest claims to renown." He also writes, in the preface to his work on Cleopatra:

"In regard to Cleopatra, especially, life was surrounded with an atmosphere of romance bordering on the fabulous. Even her bitterest foes admire her beauty and rare gifts of intellect. Her character, on the contrary, presents one of the most difficult problems of psychology. The servility of Roman poets and authors, who were unwilling frankly to acknowledge the light emanating so brilliantly from the foe of the state and the Imperator, solved it to her disadvantage. Everything that bore the name of Egyptian was hateful or suspicious to the Roman, and it was hard to forgive this woman, born on the banks of the Nile, for having seen Julius Caesar at her feet and compelled Mark Antony to do her bidding. Other historians, Plutarch at their head, explained the enigma more justly and in many respects in her favor * * * * * * *

"The Greek Plutarch, who lived much nearer the period of our heroine, estimated her more justly than most of the Roman historians. His grandfather had heard many tales of both Cleopatra and Antony from his countryman Philotas, who, during the brilliant days when they revelled in Alexandria, had lived there as a student."

Cleopatra was 39 years old when she took the asp to her bosom and died. Antony, who committed suicide after his defeat at Alexandria, was 53 at the time of his death.

The Cast.

Cleopatra .....Signora Giovanna Terribili Gonzales
Mark Antony .....Signor Antony Novelli
Augustus Caesar Octavius.....Signor Ignazio Lupi
Octavia, wife of Antony.....Signora Elsa Lenard
Charmian .....Signorina Matilde di Marzio

The Cleopatra of Signora Gonzales is an able characterization. This lady, like Cleopatra, is of middle height; but slightly exceeds the prototype in avoirdupois. Signora Gonzales is graceful and possesses a beautiful and expressive face. Her acting at all times shows keen intelligence and a firm grasp of the situation in hand. The death scene, which is admirably done, is stately and affecting.

Signor Novelli lacks the height and commanding presence that would make his Antony fully acceptable. He is still well remembered as the Vinitius of "Quo Vadis?" Signor I. Lupi, who is very happy in the role of Octavius, will be recalled for his excellent impersonation of Aulus Plantius in "Quo Vadis?" Octavia, the wronged wife, is forcefully presented by Signora Lenard and Signorina di Marzio is charming as the girl slave.

Much care has been taken in the editing of the Eight parts of this great subject. The subtitles are very appropriate, and the story throughout is excellently carried. The eight parts form three acts. The first and third acts have three parts each and the second act two parts.

The Tyranny of Censorship.

Arbitrary Rejections by the Ohio Board—Some of the Rejections and Eliminations Seem Defensible—Neff Still Strenuously Firm in Favor of the Censorship Law But Has Little Support.

By W. Stephen Bush.

Cincinnati, Dec. 23d, 1913.

THE most plausible argument advanced in favor of censorship by the advocates of the Ohio state measure was a supposed immunity from local censorship. Even this poor advantage the new law fails to secure. In the original bill, as submitted by the friends of censorship, there was contained an express proviso to the effect that all local censorship was abolished. As one of the exhibitors put it; "When this bill came out of the committee it was discovered that it had received a shave and a haircut." The one section which might have been of some possible value to the exhibitor and which offered the shadow of an excuse to its progenitors was missing.

It must be remembered that Mrs. Maude Murray Miller has the longest term of office—she is in for three years while the male members have only one or two years to serve respectively. Mrs. Miller has been asked to prepare the report of the board and she is undoubtedly the direct personal appointee of the governor acting through the industrial commission. She will be the dominating spirit of this board and she will force her notions of what may and what may not be shown on the screen upon the other members of the board and upon the public generally.

The longer one looks at this Ohio state censorship law the more evident is its bungling character. Nominally every picture which is either moral, educational or amusing or harmless is entitled to be shown. As a matter of fact, the judgment of Mrs. Miller is absolute. The rest of the population of Ohio might think a picture harmless, but if Mrs. Miller thinks otherwise, the picture goes back to the reel and stays there as far as Ohio is concerned. If Mrs. Miller objected only to things that she believes immoral or indecent, few would be inclined to criticise, but she goes much further. It would seem that she is, or aims to be, a censor of the most odious type, the medieval type of bigot which "censored" Galileo in an effort to disprove one of the most important discoveries in astronomy. Mrs. Miller rejects any subject which does not fit in with her own pet social theories. Here you have the real monstrosity of censorship. Modern minds cannot bear such censorship. The American idea is freedom of discussion for all, however our theories may differ we are equally free to proclaim and utter them and no man may legally force his notions upon his neighbor.

An Outrageous Instance of Arbitrary Rejection.

From confidential sources I learned that among the rejections made by the Censor Board, and particularly by Mrs. Miller, was a two reel feature released by one of the groups of organized manufacturers on November 22nd and entitled "By Man's Law." This feature deals with an aspect of our modern life which has furnished forth the theme of many a novel and many a play. Briefly it satirizes the kind of rich men who engage in sociological reforms and philanthropic movements but are neither just nor charitable with their employees. We may wholly disagree with the views expressed on the screen by this director, but there can be not the slightest objection by any sane or normal mind from a moral point of view. Even a fanatic in prudery will search the picture in vain for the faintest trace of immorality or indecency. The picture was rejected because the censor thought it wrong to satirize the hypocritical rich and to reflect critically upon one of the evils of the existing social order. This is the Russian way of dealing with mediums of expression. If they run counter to an official opinion suppress them by force of law. The American way is diametrically different. If Mrs. Miller does not like such a satire on the rich she has a perfect right to express her opinion on the screen. She has a right to arraign the director of the picture in the forum of reason, she may write against him and talk against him and his theories, but she has no right whatever to suppress him with the aid of the militia. The men who compose the legislature of Ohio have no right to confer any such authority on the lady, because they cannot give to another what they do not possess themselves.

I might mention other instances where pictures have been rejected by the dominant spirit of the censor board, not because they contained any thing immoral, obscene or indecent, but simply because the social theories advanced in the pictures did not happen to agree with the social theories fondly and firmly held by the censoring autocrat.

One of the censors told me that they proposed to keep in constant correspondence with the producers and advise them not only of rejections but of every elimination ordered by the board. If it were possible to change this board of censors into a board of voluntary advisers, and if in every center of population in these United States there could be found a voluntary advisory board to help the producers with suggestions as to what is undesirable on the screen, much good might be accomplished without calling in the aid of the legislature. It is a very significant fact worth considering by everybody that about ninety per cent. of the rejections in one group of ten producers must be debited to two offenders. There seems little doubt that the rejected pictures could have been suppressed by the police on the ground that they were obviously indecent, immoral or obscene.

We might well learn a lesson from all this censorship agitation by barring such scenes as all these censors, the voluntary and the legal variety, uniformly object to. There are some directors who imagine that the showing of a dive or a disreputable saloon possesses dramatic merits of a high order. Others are firmly persuaded that no true portrayal of life is possible without showing low dance halls in which misguided human beings degrade the image of their maker. Such scenes might be cut out forever, beginning today, without impairing the value of any picture.

The Opposition of Exhibitors.

In trying to get at the prevailing sentiment of the exhibitors, I made it a rule to go into what seemed to me well-conducted theaters in various parts of a city and then ask the exhibitors what they thought of the censor law. All of those whom I approached in this way were opposed to censorship and most eager to give their reasons. Opposition to censorship was thoroughly intelligent; the exhibitors knew why they were opposed to the system and they certainly knew how to express themselves. I always asked the exhibitors whether they had any means of knowing what the general sentiment among their fellows was and whenever the answer was in the affirmative they said they were sure that the great majority of exhibitors disliked censorship.

I had an interview with the president of the league in his office in the Mercantile Library Building, in Cincinnati, and he expressed the opinion that scarcely twenty per cent. of the exhibitors were against censorship. Even while we were talking a young man from Dayton walked in who is the president of the Dayton local organization. Mr. Neff asked him whether his local was in favor of censorship and the censorship law and received a decided answer in the negative.

Outside of a strictly personal following in Cleveland and Cincinnati, it does not appear that the president of the National League has much support in his attitude toward censorship. He expressed the opinion that all the doubters would again be in line before the meeting of the Ohio state convention, which has been set for January 27th.

While Mr. Neff is as strenuous as ever in his advocacy of legal censorship, and while his scheme of a national censor congress is clearly outlined in his own mind, he disclaims all responsibility for the appointment of Mrs. Maude Murray Miller. He is not at all in sympathy with her ideas and methods. Mr. Neff declared that the men who are now opposed to censorship were not long ago in favor of it and especially his opponents in the city of Cleveland.

Everybody is now waiting for the decision of the three Federal Judges who have been appealed to for an interlocutory injunction against the enforcement of the censorship law now on the statute books of Ohio.

The printed forms of approval or rejection which form part of the record of the proceedings before the Federal Court have been adopted by all the censors and are issued in the following form.

The Industrial Commission of Ohio

"A Lady of Quality."

Cecilia Loftus Does Good Work in an Entertaining Five-Part Production of the Famous Players.

By George Blaisdell.

IN "A Lady of Quality," a five-part subject which the Famous Players released on January 1, Miss Cecilia Loftus has a role of which she makes a great deal. It is her first appearance before the camera, but she gives a performance which has in it little evidence that such is the fact. The picture will make excellent entertainment. There are artistic interiors of great depth; the furnishings, of an early period, are elaborate. The costumes are varied and expensive. There are fine ensembles. There are a few outdoor scenes, and they will charm by their pictorial value. These various factors, combined with good acting, are bound to interest and hold any audience. One of the strongest scenes is where Clorinda is overheard by the Duke of Osmonde as she confesses to her sister that she killed Sir John Oxon. Another, and perhaps the real dramatic moment of the five reels, is where Clorinda falls to her knees and kisses the hand of Osmonde, the man who has loved her from the beginning and to whom she was drawn at the first meeting.

Scene from "A Lady of Quality" (Famous Players).

There is tragedy in the story as well as comedy, although some of the effect of it is lost on the observer through his inability definitely to determine at first whether Sir John really has been killed by the blow from Clorinda's whip or whether he has only been stunned. It is natural to suppose that a riding whip wielded by a woman would hardly be of sufficient force to produce more than temporary unconsciousness. The dragging of the heavy body of the man to the cellar was no small accomplishment; Clorinda's task was made realistic partly by the great amount of physical energy required.

If the latter half of the picture is more serious the first part is light and at times rollicking. Peter Lang has a part that fits him down to the ground. As the boisterous, roisterous old squire you can't help liking him, even in spite of the fact that he has refused to have anything to do with the baby arrival just because it was a girl. One of the best scenes in the picture is where little Edna Weick, impersonating the six-year-old Clorinda, stands by the fireplace throwing powder from the horn into the fire. The resentment she displays when the Falstaffian-molded Sir Jeoffry attempts to interfere with her sport will be enjoyed in any house. She picks up a hunting crop and belabors the paternal leathered legs with all the vim of an angry flail-swinging rustic. When in response to his yells the frightened servants gather and inform Sir Jeoffry that the raging midget is his own daughter, the old man takes the child to his heart. It is an effective and convincing bit of work.

Miss Loftus is advantaged in picture work by the fact that she photographs splendidly. It will be surprising if she did not make up her mind when she first saw the production on the screen that she would again appear before the camera. She may be sure of a public. In her earlier scenes, when attired in male garments, she displays a dash and abandon that match the family name of Wildair. Her duel with Oxon is skillfully carried out and worthy of the masculine garb. She interests and charms in her initial scene, which achievement makes for the success of any picture.

House Peters plays the Duke of Osmonde. The introduction of the duke to Clorinda is impressive. In fact, the duke brings to the drama a side of life opposed to that portrayed by the other male characters. His role is a serious one. He is eminently qualified to carry it out; it is a finished performance he gives us. Hal Clarendon does good work in the unpopular part of Sir John Oxon, the pleasure-loving Londoner, who wins Clorinda and at the same time a wager that formed the basis for his conquest. His duel with Clorinda makes one of the more interesting scenes of the play. Others in the cast are Dave Wall, Geraldine O'Brien, Alexander Gaden, and Roy Pilser.

Pictures Stimulate Interest in Play.

President Atkinson of Puritan Special Features Co., Says that "Quincy Adams Sawyer" Picture Helps the Dramatic Production.

It is the common excuse of theatrical managers and producers to lay the blame for the bad business in their particular line to the prevalence of the motion picture entertainment. It was the easiest way out and the motion picture has been the "goat" for many a bad stage play. Here, however, is some testimony quite to the contrary of the usual, and it comes from a man who seems to be interested in both pictures and drama—Charles F. Atkinson, president of the Puritan Special Features Company, of Boston, Mass., which produced the feature picture, "Quincy Adams Sawyer," a story previously related in book and dramatic form. We give Mr. Atkinson's letter in full:

An object lesson of much interest has attracted my attention and I thought perhaps it might be of interest to the many enterprising managers interested in the Moving Picture business and show business in general.

When we produced "Quincy Adams Sawyer" in pictures the 24th day of last January, we felt that the interest in the play might be affected and the demand cease for it on account of these pictures, but to our surprise and satisfaction the pictures have acted just the contrary. In several of the large cities like Providence, Springfield and Lowell and very many others we can name, the picture has been shown for from three days to a week, and then a very short time after the exhibition of the picture, one of the opposition houses running stock have produced the play, and in every instance the business has been from big to capacity, and so now we are trying very hard, where the play is being presented by Stock Companies or a traveling company, to interest some picture house to exhibit the picture in advance. One of the strange conditions is the fact that several of the managers who had and are producing this play by their stock companies either own, manage or are interested in other picture houses in the same city, and the picture play was presented in one of the opposition picture houses instead of one of their theaters.

I thought that perhaps this point that has been so well established in our mind might be of much interest to your readers that are managing regular theaters and plays and moving picture theaters, I believe it must be a great question with owners and managers of plays, as to the affect on the play and the results of its financial future when presented in pictures, particularly so on account of so many plays having been put into pictures since "Quincy Adams Sawyer" was first produced last January.

UNIVERSAL AUTO SERVICE IN BOSTON.

In accordance with the progressive methods of a wide-awake business man, J. A. Eslow, general manager of the Universal Film Company's Boston branch, has inaugurated an auto delivery and collection service. This innovation has expedited service, and it is greatly appreciated by theater managers getting their service from the Universal Company. In addition to delivering and collecting films from the theaters. the auto is also used for carrying and receiving shipments of films, etc., to and from railway depots and piers.

"Soldiers of Fortune"

Six-Reel All Star Feature.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THE tendency of the All Star Company is to canonize authors rather than to vulgarize them, and they have certainly showered all that their accomplished directors and splendid actors could contribute to illustrate what Richard Harding Davis had to say in "Soldiers of Fortune." Great pains have not only been taken in the selection of types, the choice of attractive, natural scenery and to achieve accuracy of an infinite amount of detail, but an attempt has been made, a serious one, to fully illustrate the book itself.

Scene from "Soldiers of Fortune" (All Star).

The only trouble is that no one, possibly not the writer himself, has ever classed Davis as a novelist, though he may have aspired to be the American Anthony Hope, with a Central American background.

Davis, with a reporter's comprehensive view, saw enough of New York City to keep him supplied with material, and he was artist enough to delineate one of the most delightful of characters in "Van Bibber." His short stories are

Scene from "Soldiers of Fortune" (All Star).

O. Henry-like in workmanship, and knowledge of how to pull the characters about in a business-like way followed him into larger work, but it hardened the arteries of those characters—their pulse beats are not to be felt. He was long ago forgiven by the public, if not by the critics, for having attempted to write big stories, and so charming is his personality that most of us believe he will yet succeed, just as a fond mother believes her son is bound to be President of the United States.

Luckily for the success of the feature play, the able directors of it did not confine its movements to the form of sensationalism the book contains, that scene aboard during the "Cruise of the Good Ship 'Piffle.'" Directors and actors of unquestioned ability, such as are those of the All Star Company, could not cut loose in any sort of photodrama and not make it interesting. Dustin Farnum rose to all the opportunities he had. John Sainpolis, John Pratt, Leighton Stark, Geo. A. Stillwell, William Conklin, Sam Coit, Ernest Laceby and Winthrop Chamberlain—what a fine lot of types for any American drama! When they do get under way, after long and careful preparation to untwist the complication of dealing fairly with so many characters, they make things hum to an extent that we lose track of them as individuals.

My hat is off to those who selected the outdoor scenes, who infused natural beauty where the spiritual was so sadly lacking, who opened the doors to ideality by the sweetness and suggestion of landscape and seascape. Literature pales and the stage drama turns sick when it comes to holding up the mirror to Nature in her loveliest moods. The opening coast views, the glimpses of street scenes in towns of torrid America, the forest glades of tropic charm, all these are chosen with that critical faculty and artistic appreciation that reveal instinct for form and beauty, the soul of a true artist.

Directors and actors have given freely of their hearts and minds to invest the story with charm, but they can not portray what is not there. Human life and nature are there, but they only furnish the raw material for the body formed from them by artistic conventions. The result is a sculptured form, Galatea. Imagination is the prayer of Pygmalion that animates the thing of beauty. "The moment art surrenders its imaginative medium," says one of the greatest of dramatists, "it surrenders everything." Splendid visualization is art, but it is not enough.

SCREEN CLUB RUNS OFF A REEL.

One of the best evenings that the Screen Club has held so far was the informal smoker of December 27th. A crowd of perhaps seventy-five screeners and their guests comfortably filled the grill room where, all the evening long, smoke wreaths went up among the Christmas greens; songs started at the piano and radiated through the room, or good stories held the crowd and then shook it with laughter. Our old friend John Bunny, was in the chair and, assisted by Arthur Leslie, managed to get attention at about nine o'clock to announce that the purpose of the gathering was solely to have a good time informally. He promised to call for songs, dances or stories, and threatened direst penalties to that recalcitrant brother who refused to deliver. The penalty was to put a dollar down on the bar and as a starter ordered set before each and every brother or guest whatever he might choose. A stack of church warden pipes and a plenteous supply of tobacco had been provided and every one was smoking. It seemed, with John Bunny talking over all those long stemmed pipes, as though Time had turned back to Father Knickerbocker's youth and that some councilman of the doughty Anthony Van Twiller type was presiding.

Perhaps the big hit of the evening was a stirring talk by Burr MacIntosh who has recently become a motion picture man and is back in town for a few days before going to the West. He spoke to the makers of moving pictures, all who had anything to do with them, reminded them that glorious possibilities lay before them and especially of the fact that the effect of the new art is going to be tremendous for good or ill, since millions are watching them every day. He told the members that the best possible things were worth striving for. He didn't want to speak as a critic; he understood that conditions didn't permit an artist to do as he pleased or thought best at all times; but he advised us not to forget that the possibilities were there. It was just some big-hearted, healthy encouragement.

Phil Lang's singing of that fine old "Nut Brown Ale" song also made a distinct hit. Dr. Ivory played several selections on the saxophone and was received so enthusiastically that he continued at the piano, playing accompaniments while the members sang. Things were served that go with a good time and every one seemed enjoying the evening.

BELLE ADAIR FOR ECLAIR LEADS.

Belle Adair, new leading woman of the Eclair Film Company, will soon occupy a place in the hearts of the photoplay public. With wonderfully charming and expressive features, Miss Adair is making her initial bow to the audiences of nickels and dimes, but for years she has head-lined bills on the big time vaudeville circuits throughout the United States. She played a prominent part with Julian Eltinge in "The Fascinating Widow" and has "trouped" with various companies, from the "road show" to Broadway successes. The lure of the silent celluloid has claimed her as its own, now, and she may be ranked as one of the finds of the season. Miss Adair is a New Yorker, educated in Pennsylvania and confesses to twenty-three years. She can ride, swim, box and run like a man, and drives her own car.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE.

At the recent meeting of the officials and executive body of the International Motion Picture Association, in Chicago, Wm. J. Sweeney, of this city, was the only speaker who protested against the torrent of abuse cast at President Neff, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. With considerable heat he reminded the speakers that the object of the meeting was to bring the two factions together, and that the effecting of that object was of higher importance than any one man or set of men.

No more timely utterance could have been made, and how much better would it have been had the seceders been guided by its wisdom at the late national convention in New York. One firm hand and wise head could have saved the hour by making the election of Mr. Neff unanimous, and waiting until the next election to elect another man for president.

It was an exhibition of poor politics and worse taste on the part of the bolting delegates to leave the hall when they were beaten to a frazzle; for Mr. Neff was elected before the stampede took place. That is past, however, and the future holds out hope for a united organization. That should be the slogan for 1914. Stop all this abuse and recrimination and get together.

The Moving Picture World has always been the friend of the exhibitor, and it will continue to be so notwithstanding the abuse of a few rule-or-ruin men. Its present stand is for the greatest good of the greater number. It is fearless in that stand, and the future will prove that it is right.

It is incumbent on the seceders, in order to prove their sincerity, that they take the place of the conceding party and not that of the dominant. Unless this is done their efforts will result in still further disintegration.

The Higher Trend of Moving Pictures.

"The admirable pianist, Hofmann, likes moving pictures and freely patronizes them," stated the Chicago Record Herald recently, in an editorial. "Yet he has misgivings. The moving pictures, he says, give you everything and leave nothing to the imagination. They are as realistic and complete as the ultra-naturalist novel. Persons who have reached years of discretion, Hofmann thinks, are safe enough in the moving pictures; but what of children and young boys and girls? How is their imagination to be stimulated and cultivated?

"The answer is that the moving pictures are lifting themselves out of the naturalistic stage and putting more and more imagination into their repertory. There is nothing fixed or stereotyped about them. They grow and change as the drama does, as music does. They are constantly adding elements that involve an appeal to the sense of beauty, of wonder, of romance. They are drawing on science, art, exploration and travel. Crude fun and photographing realism are passing. The higher culture will annex them as it has invaded and transformed the variety stage. The patrons of moving pictures and vaudeville appreciate the best things offered them, and appreciation of the good soon brings the elimination of the outgrown and inferior."

The "High Sign" Saves Ex-Alderman of Chicago.

Ex-Alderman Francis, of Chicago, tells some stirring experiences in Mexico during his absence of seven weeks. In that time he has been reported shot by the rebels and in close straits from pursuing federal cavalry.

"It was my fortune to be in El Paso at the time the battle took place at Juarez, across the river. I remember the fight was on a Saturday, although I cannot recall the date.

"I chanced to meet a company of moving picture actors in El Paso, who were going across the border with their manager to take pictures. They invited me to accompany them. I consented and was given the uniform of a federal officer of cavalry, in which I was to appear in the battle field films. We embarked in a large automobile for the scene of activity. Hardly had we crossed the international bridge, when half a dozen leveled carbines stopped us. We were taken as spies.

"I was thrown into a 'dobe' prison with two political prisoners. They were doomed to die. So was I. For a whole day they kept us without food or drink. Then the hidalgo, or whoever he is who has charge of the prison, came to lead us to the old convent wall. He wore a Masonic pin. I am a Mason. I gave him the high sign and it was arranged.

"That night a big, black automobile steamed into a mesquite hiding place near by. Ponies were waiting near. At a signal we sprang from our cells—the doors had been unlocked—and vaulted into the saddle. Shots flashed out of the dark at us. This was the undoing of the rebels; for it brought down a troop of federal cavalry, who silenced them. Then the cavalry took up the pursuit of us.

"By this time we were in the automobile, and soon dropped the federal cavalry. It seemed we traveled all night. Then we drove into a town. We thought we were safe. Heavens! We had driven in a circle and were back in Juarez.

"We were taken before Pancho Villa. You have heard of him. A splendid man in spite of a somewhat shady reputation. He and I became friendly. He wanted me to join his forces; but I was tired of Mexico and warfare. I gave him some advice, but he could not understand English, and he didn't get me. Later it turned out that every point I gave him would have beaten the federals. Shortly afterward I was back in California."

Chicago Aldermen Taboo White Slave Film.

In an effort to induce the city authorities to permit the exhibition in Chicago of the motion picture, "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic," the managers of the sociological fund of the Medical Review of Reviews gave a private exhibition of the photoplay Sunday afternoon, December 28, at Ziegfeld's Theater.

Mayor Harrison, to whom a special invitation had been sent, was not present. The audience numbered about 200 people, including three aldermen and a number of clubwomen interested in child protective work.

When Manager Paul Bern read from the stage, during an intermission, a number of telegrams purporting to have been received from a distinguished Eastern sociologist, a bald-headed man in the audience exclaimed:

"That's a lie. No decent man would send such a telegram."

"Put him out," said an excited woman.

An usher induced the man to refrain from further interruption.

"I think this motion play is too indecent to be shown even in this sort of a private exhibition," said Alderman James A. Kearns. "Major Funkhouser, the Chicago police censor, performed a public service in prohibiting it."

"The New York police stopped it, and our police should never let it open here," said Alderman Henry P. Bergen.

"It might give warning of the white slave pitfalls if it could be exhibited only to girls over sixteen and their mothers," said William L. Bodine, superintendent of compulsory education. "Its lesson for men—especially young men and boys—is bad, showing them how to become white slavers."

"There is nothing indecent so far as I can see," said Mrs. Herman Landauer, one of the woman's committee which saw the film at the city hall a few days ago. "Certain unsophisticated women ought to see it, but it ought not to be shown in theaters to all women."

Chicago Film Brevities.

Chester Beecroft, publicity manager for the General Film Co., in New York City, paid us a flying visit last week.

E. R. Pearson, manager of the General Film Company's Omaha branch, stopped over in the city recently on his return home from New York City. It was a pleasure to meet Mr. Pearson, as he is an intelligent and up-to-date film man.

T. H. Gibbes, proprietor of the Princess Theater, Galva, Ill., writes that he had a film fire recently, in which two reels were consumed without any damage to the operating room or the theater. The fire was caused by one of the reels being placed in contact with an electric light globe. Mr. Gibbes paid for the reels and immediately took out film insurance without solicitation.

Robert T. Kane, sales manager of the American Theater Curtain & Supply Co., of St. Louis, visited the World office a short time ago. He stated that F. P. Bloomfield, who has been doing a very thriving business for the company in Pittsburgh, has been appointed manager of the new office recently opened in that city.

I received a unique Christmas card from I. Van Ronkle, the enterprising manager of the General Film Company's branch offices in this city. A similar card was sent out to all his patrons. The following greeting was tastefully printed in colors on the card: "Smile awhile, and while you smile, another smiles, and soon there's miles and miles of smiles, and life's worth while because you get service from the General Film Co., you smile."

A. L. Kahn, general booking clerk for the Anti-Trust branch of the Universal, this city, was married to Miss Ida Lewis, Sunday, December 7. The wedding took place at the West Chicago Club House, where about 400 guests assembled, many of whom are connected with the film business in this city. Mr. Kahn has been with the Anti-Trust exchange for the past four years, and has risen from film inspector to his present position. The World wishes him and his bride long and happy lives.

Louis A. J. Geleng, in charge of the technical cinematographic work of the Law Scenic Studio, at 502 W. 38th St., New York City, and the O. C. Gaylord Aereolog Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, called at our office recently. Mr. Geleng has just finished a series of pictures for the O. C. Gaylord Aereolog Co., describing the cities of Canton, Massillon and Akron, Ohio. A unique feature of these pictures is birdseye views taken from an aeroplane. Mr. Geleng has also taken about 8,000 feet of industrial pictures at Cleveland, showing the manufacturing processes of various industries, as for instance, the work and machinery in an automobile factory and the various processes in jelly and preserve manufacturing. Another interesting subject shows the methods employed in a large business college, from the time of application of the student, through all the various departments, until receiving his diploma. Mr. Geleng stopped in Chicago for a few days to celebrate Christmas with relatives.

A. A. Powers, manager of the Park Theater, 5960 W. Lake St., Chicago, and booking agent for the Park Theater, Austin; the Play House, Oak Park; the Southern, Oak Park, and the Palm, Rockford, called at the World office Friday, December 19th. All these houses, with the exception of the last named, are owned by the United Play Co., the last being owned by newspaper men in Rockford, and opened December 1st. The Park Theater, in Chicago, seats 700 people, and uses Exclusive, licensed and independent service. The Park Theater, in Austin, also seats 700 and uses Exclusive and independent service. The Play House seats 700 and uses the same service. The Southern seats 550 and uses Mutual and Universal service. The Palm seats 800 people and uses Exclusive and licensed service. Admission in all the houses is 10 cents.

Charles Breuning, operator of the Apollo Theater, Janesville, Wis., was a visitor at the office recently. The Apollo runs two reels of pictures (Universal), and four acts of vaudeville. Admission is 10 and 20 cents. Mr. Breuning reported good business.

A. W. Miller, has opened the Crystal Theater, a new house, in Clinton Junction, Wis. The Crystal seats 250 people and is fire-proof. An admission of 10 cents is charged.

D. P. Long, manager and owner of the Casino Theater, Racine, Wis., was seen by me at the Wisconsin convention. Mr. Long informed me that there are 10 moving picture theaters at present in Racine and that two more are being built. The seating capacities range from 250 to 1,600. Mr. Long is an old moving picture exhibitor and prides himself on having taken the first picture machine into the "Iron" range (around Marquette), about 10 years ago, opening February 7th, 1903, in Iron Mountain. George K. Spoor, president of Essanay, was then booming his Kinodrome machine. Mr. Long is an interesting conversationalist, and I had some hearty laughs as he recounted some of his experiences in the early days.

Harvey Hansen, of Antigo, Wis., was also at the convention and he informed me that he is now building a new house, with a capacity of 700 seats on the ground floor and 150 in the balcony. The house will cost $25,000. Mr. Hansen is running the Palace Theater at present to fine business. Licensed service from Milwaukee is used.

During a conversation with E. F. Knaak, owner of the Majestic Theater, Portage, Wis., I learned that his home town had a population of 5,500, with three picture theaters to entertain them. Moving pictures are very popular in Portage, Mr. Knaak said. The Majestic seats 256 people and an admission of five cents is charged. Mutual service is used and the house is showing to very good business.

COURT SCORES VICE FILM PROMOTERS.

Justice Gavegan Vacates Temporary Order Against Police and Denies Application for Permanent Injunction Relief.

In denying the application of the "white-slave film" promoters for a permanent injunction against the police who want to suppress the pictures, Justice Gavegan, sitting at Special Term in the New York Supreme Court, handed down the following opinion:

Some of the films depict scenes supposed to be enacted in a resort where women are subjected to involuntary degradation. As it is well known that to maintain such a place is of itself a criminal offense, I am unable to perceive why the public exhibition for money of scenes supposed to transpire therein should be entitled to the protection of a court of equity.

It is contended by the plaintiff in affidavits furnished by disinterested individuals whose motives it is not within the province of this court to question that the pictures contain a great moral lesson to fathers and mothers calculated to impress upon their minds the urgent need of protecting their daughters from the influence of evil associations.

The answer to this is that the exhibition has not been confined to fathers and mothers; that there is no evidence before me that the owners thereof propose or desire to so confine it, and that the evidence shows they are conducting the enterprise not for the uplift of public morals but for private gain.

It might be possible to find individuals of such morbid curiosity that they would be willing to pay an admission price to see the inside workings of a sewer, and others of such avaricious enterprise that they would be ready to capitalize such morbid curiosity and furnish the exhibition for a price, and still others, among the well meaning and unwary who would lend their sanction and privilege to the idea, in the belief that such an exhibition by its horrible example might tend to improve the habits of cleanliness of some in the audience and that the public ought to know about it in any event. If the illustration is disagreeable it is no more so than the facts with which I have to deal.

Justice Gavegan expressed doubt if the owners of the plaintiff corporation would have had the audacity to undertake the public display of certain revolting details contained in the exhibition if it were not for the general discredit in which they evidently but erroneously believe the police to be held in this city.

The police as a body are entitled to, and I believe have, the confidence of the community at large, notwithstanding the reflections now and then cast upon them by the conduct of some of their unworthy members. It would be equally unjust to stigmatize theatrical managers as a class because of exhibitions of depravity and inordinate greed for gain on the part of some of its members.

Justice Gavegan said he had been unable to find a single case of police interference with such productions which was not justified, and that if persons engaged in licensed callings abuse their license and run afoul of the penal law they will be relegated by a court of equity to the tribunal where such matters belong. The court concludes:

The exhibition in question, or at least parts of it, tend to deprave and corrupt the morals of those whose minds are open to such influences, and therefore the application for an injunction is denied.

BOSWORTH MAKING LONDON'S "BARLEYCORN."

Jack London's alcoholic autobiography is to be acted, filmed, and scattered broadcast through the country, by Bosworth, Incorporated, of Los Angeles, Hobart Bosworth himself directing the production. The first scenes are mainly taken in Oakland, Cal., Jack London's former home, the scene of many of his bouts with John Barleycorn. The main character, who stalks through the scenes of London's discussion-inspiring book is, of course, the hidden specter of King Alcohol. It is he who moves the character at the most vital moments of his career—who impels him to go to sea, to become a wanderer on the face of the earth. But the visible character, the center of many stirring and wild affairs in dives, water-front saloons, on board ships, and in the streets of foreign cities, is London himself; and here the film artists will find their chance for convincing art.

Jack London.

Three actors of the Bosworth Company are sharing the difficult task of portraying this character. They are: Master Matty Roubert, six years old, the celebrated child actor, formerly of the Universal Company; an older boy actor, Antrim Short, and Mr. Elmer Clifton.

Clifton's extraordinary facial and physical resemblance to Jack London was one of the reasons why he was chosen for the part.

Following the "Barleycorn" picture, the Bosworth Company, which has a contract to produce all of London's works in motion pictures, will film "The Valley of the Moon," "Martin Eden," "Smoke Bellew," "Burning Daylight," "The Iron Heel," etc.

PARIS LETTER.

(Special Correspondence to The World.)

THE Repetion Generale of Kinemacolor, at the Theater Edouard VII, was given on Friday, December 12th, and the first public performance took place the following night.

The building is located in the Place Edouard VII opposite the high-class hotel of the same name. Mr. R. C. W. Sprague, of London, planned the theater and the furnishing was carried out in its entirety by Messrs. Hampton and Sons, of London. A whole army of British workmen have been engaged on the work for over a year. The theater must rank as one of the finest in the capital. Parisians are quite unused to such grandeur and it may actually take them some time to acquire the Kinemacolor way of passing an evening. The color scheme is cream and gold and the decorating has been charmingly carried out in the Louis XVI style. The fauteuils are in red plush and the carpets are of the same color. A number of mirrors add largely to the attractiveness of the hall. There are two tiers above the ground floor. Each floor has its separate lounge and smoking room. On the stall floor an orchestra plays during the three intermissions so that there is music all the time. Access is gained to the gallery, balcony and stalls by stairways which lead into the main hall. Every seat provides a perfect view of the stage. Before the screen is placed an imitation glass window, this slides away but at no time is the bare white screen displayed. The orchestra is hidden from the spectators. The operating room is at the rear of the balcony. Prices of admission range from two francs to eight francs, the latter figure being the price of a box seat. Performances are given every afternoon and evening. A feature is the Kinemacolor Tea; the refreshment department is under the control of the Hotel Edouard VII, which is to say that everything is of the highest quality. For the opening program, Charles Urban exhibited a varied selection of natural color films displaying the possibilities of the patent. These included pictures of the King and Queen of England; President Poincaré on his recent auto tour through France, and scenes from all parts of the world. Garbed as a Harlequin or the "Lady of Kinemacolor," Mlle. Valentine Lugand spoke a prologue describing the theater and Kinemacolor. The Theater Edouard VII is a unique establishment and reflects the greatest credit on its proprietor, Charles Urban.

An attempt is being made to launch the Kinoplastikon here. A syndicate, having offices in the Rue Blanche, has, during the past months, expended a very considerable sum of money on advertising in daily and trade papers this Viennese novelty. All efforts to sell the invention have, apparently, up till now proved futile.

V. Barton and Rosen have sold out their interests in the Casino de Paris to a syndicate at the head of which is Jacques Munoz late director of the Kosmorama. Munoz is the pioneer of exclusives in Paris. He is an astute man with advanced ideas about the moving picture exhibition business. It would appear that he arrived in the French capital just a little before his time. If Jacques Munoz succeeds in making the Rue de Clichy picturedrome pay then he will have solved the toughest amusement proposition Paris has ever known.

Prince, the Varietes comedian and famous Patheplay actor, automobiled up just outside my office the other morning and preceeded to do some acting before the Hotel Chatham in the Rue Volney. The cameraman was stationed on top of a taxicab. Of course, the strange scene created an immense amount of excitement and many American visitors—of whom there are many always to be seen around this quarter—watched the proceedings. Probably the happiest person in the crowd of onlookers was a little red haired vendeuse who caught the eye of the cinematograph actor. "You're very pretty," said Prince to the smiling girl, at the same time slipping into her hand half a dozen tickets for a neighboring movie.

I have been privileged to see a most remarkable modern drama by the Cines Company. Maria Carmi, the actress who created such a sensation in the "Miracle," at Olympia, London, plays the leading part. This is Mlle. Carmi's first appearence in motion pictures. Without a doubt she will be acclaimed as the most wonderful cinematograph artist of the day.

BRITISH NOTES.

(Special Correcpondence to The World.)

THE Parliamentary Department Committee on celluloid issued its report this week. This document states that while the composition of moving picture films does not differ from that of an ordinary photographic film it presents a much larger surface than any other celluloid article, and the celluloid used is more highly nitrated than ordinary celluloid and, for this reason also, burns more fiercely. The committee favors non-inflammable films and thinks that in order to encourage the production of safe films the Home Office might be empowered to relax the usual requirements for moving picture shows using them. Certain suggestions are extended regulating the manufacture of film base in this country, but, seeing that 99 per cent. of the film base used on this side is manufactured in America, these suggestions appear a trifle premature. "We regret that we cannot say," adds the committee, "that the conditions under which the business is carried on are in all cases satisfactory. We know of a case in Glasgow where a large quantity of film was stored beneath a hotel and two fires have occurred in London beneath flats." In conclusion the report vigorously condemns the practice of some renting concerns of selling to children strips of disused stock.

The British and Colonial Co., who made the successful "Battle of Waterloo," are now diverting their attention to other channels with an ambitious scheme for the portrayal of the life of Shakespeare. Some sections of the production have already been taken at Walthanston and where permissable the original scenes will be visited by the company of players and operators. Approximately 160 scenes will constitute the feature and if, as literary statistics assert, the Stratford Bard be more popular with Americans than with his countrymen the production of the B. & C. Company should be worth watching.

A novel and ingenious advertising scheme was engineered through the principal thoroughfares of the metropolis last week by the Davison Film Agency. A fleet of motor cars laden with thousands of toy balloons went whizzing through the different streets. An assistant in each car inflated and liberated them, a few at a time. Pedestrians, street boys, people on buses, and even policemen made a grab for the trophies which were found to advertise "The Master Crook."

OFFICIAL NOTICE.

The National Executive Committee of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will hold their semi-annual meeting on January 26th, 1914, at the Sinton Hotel, Cincinnati, Ohio.

It is the desire of the executive committee that every state branch, local or individual member, who has a grievance or complaint of any kind, to file same with secretary of their state branch; he in turn will file grievance with the national secretary.

All members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America are cordially invited to attend this important meeting.

The national secretary will receive complaints at 1615 East 8th St., Kansas City, Missouri, until January 21st, 1914. After that date all communications must be addressed to Sinton Hotel, Cincinnati, Ohio. Very truly yours.

Geo. H. Wiley, National Secretary.

Frank Smith.

Student of the Silent Drama, Assistant Director and First Character Man of Imp Company.

THE birth and childhood of motion pictures has been strenuous; men have entered the field and gone broke and men have made fortunes within a few years; men have entered the artistic end and like a skyrocket, have dashed into fame only to sink out again quite as sudden. Bluff and boast and wild haste have had there place in the development of the industry; but only a small place. Right now there is a great shuffle and weeding-out and the men who have moved by thin gas are to be found crumpled by the road while those who have stood for conservatism, for rationalism, who have studied the game from all angles, are to be found firmly planted in the high places.

Frank Smith.

Frank Smith, assistant director to King Baggot, character lead and scenario writer is classed with the latter. Frank is and has always been conservative, far-seeing and a student. He was an artist of the highest rank when he entered motion picture work as assistant director with Herbert Brenon in the Imp some years back. Frank has never been a self-booster, but there are many who know him and his sterling qualities.

Frank was born in 1860 in Paris, Kentucky, of rich, but honest parents. At the close of the Civil War, Frank moved, with his parents, to New Orleans where his father managed "The New Orleans Varieties Theater." At that time Frank, in child parts, supported such stars as Charlotte Cushman, Forrest, Joe Jefferson and Ben De Barr. In fact Frank has spent all his life among the scenery and grease. He supported, in later years, stars such as John T. Raymond, Chas. Fechter, McKee Rankin, Fanny Davenport and Robert Mantell. He starred for three years in "The Sign of the Cross," after which he came under the management of Mr. Brenon, in Johnstown, Pa. From this stock engagement he went into the pictures.

Back Row—Neil Duffy, Appleton, Treasurer; Harry H. Burford, La Crosse, President; W. C. Judson, Portage, Vice-President; John R. Ek, Oshkosh, National Vice-President.

Front Row—C. L. Hiller, Eau Claire, Sergeant-at-Arms; A. H. Grey, Secretary, Oshkosh; H. C. Zander, Second Vice-President.

Moving Picture Educator

IN THE THROES OF THE CONFLICT.

By Rev. W. H. Jackson.

A GREAT storm is not necessarily a misfortune, yet its after effects may be beneficial. The coming together of mighty forces may be terrific and seemingly disastrous, yet they may each partially subdue the other, and an effective combination result. Great problems relative to the greater moral welfare of a nation are not solved without many a battle in the arena where education, wisdom and justice, wrestle with each other for a proper, proportionate, and beneficial adjustment which secures the desired result of "the greatest good to the greatest number."

Parties seemingly antagonistic to each other are really contending for the supremacy of that view which appears to them nearest to the accomplishment of a certain purpose, although in many instances they are wide of the issue. Into this state has the moving picture now come in a perfectly natural manner consequent upon its educational progress for:

Solving Social and Moral Questions.

To those to whom every state of applied kinematography is a familiar subject, it is not surprising that when the moving picture invaded the realms of social and moral science, it would enter into one of the greatest conflicts of its educational work. The writer of the plot, and the maker of the film, daring to enter this field, must remember that these are places where "angels fear to tread" and when mortals "rush" therein they are responsible for the terrific conflict they bring about.

The Battle Ground.

New York City is at the present time the battle ground where is being fought at once the power and scope of the moving picture in dealing with social evils. Social and moral experts, real and sham; legal advisers lending positive or negative aid on a financial basis; police with strained interpretations of beclouded laws; reformers with pet schemes; judges with opinions and judicial interpretations as many as their numerical strength; and clergymen—propounding truths which must be met; all these, with a thousand smaller issues, are contending with varied objectives for the supremacy.

The Motive and Methods.

It is only consistent with one phase of human nature, that motives may be questionable, and their methods such as shall soon expose their nature. It is an evil motive which seeks to commercialize a moral question in such a manner as to make its success dependent upon the method of arousing a morbid curiosity. Appeals to the sensuousness of the crowd, making warnings attractive, are only low excuses for some to make public under the guise of "helpful exposures" that which under any other and more truthful name would be immediately suppressed. The devil knows that he is too well known to appear in his native habits without being immediately detected; but he is no less the devil if he does "transform himself into an angel of light"; and he can well afford to have the battle fought between wit and wisdom as to whether he is devil or angel.

The Weapon.

The most recently invented weapon arriving upon the field of battle is immediately pressed into service; in this instance it is the moving picture. Its powers were immediately and universally recognized and adopted. The only people whose opinion is to be ignored as worthless and contemptible, are those who blame the moving picture as though it were the origin of, instead of being only an instrument in the fight. Between the contending forces the conflict surrounds the question as to whether or not the moving picture shall in its great and wonderful educational progress, be the means of solving many of the social and moral questions of the day.

The Victory.

The moving picture will prevail. The contending forces are each in their own way necessary, some for elimination, others for perpetuation; when the sifting shall have been finished, social and moral progress will be taught by aid of the moving picture. The best of the criticisms will be used as a basis for future films, the hypocrisy of commercialized vice compromised with virtue will be unmasked, and the pictures will be as pure as the light on whose rays its outlines travel. Two precedents assure this result. First, the moving picture has by its own inherent qualities again and again lifted itself from many depths and dangers into which it was temporarily placed; possessing within itself the irresistible power of an educational progress, nothing can do any more than momentarily hinder its progress. Second, the final jury of public opinion is true, this final jury is sometimes slow in its decisions, it is prefaced by many minor verdicts, but in the court of last resort it will prevail. It is not surprising that these first pictures of moral teachings should be faulty; the subject is at present both beyond originator and maker. To teachers and judges of great moral questions will fall the office of censorship and advisor, while applied kinematography finds in such men as W. Stephen Bush (whose article on "Sex Problems on the Screen" is particularly appropriate), those who can safely direct the proper course which the moving picture can most educationally take. In all the vast fields of its powers of teaching, the great culture of moral laws will find its best exponent in the well and properly directed uses of the moving picture.

Churches in Contrast.

The Trinity Church of Williamsport, Pa., of which the Rev. R. F. Gibson is pastor, has just been supplied with a moving picture outfit by the Picture Theater Equipment Company of New York City. This is not cited as an unusual event, but simply noted as an addition to the evergrowing list of churches availing themselves of the helpfulness of the moving picture. In West Orange, N. J., a church has recently been closed because it could not resist the attractions of the moving picture to which it was opposed. What a different report might have been recorded if this church had used the pictures instead of fighting them.

It is indeed a lamentable state of things when a church dies from inertia or inability to assimilate that which possesses attributes advantageous to its own cause and work. What a pity more clergymen and church workers do not read these pages where these questions are plainly balanced and the true spirit of the church and the picture presented.

It is satisfying to know, however, that the rapid development now being made will soon end the lack of comprehension now so evident in many places.

NICKELS AND DIMES.

EVERYONE at some time or other in life comes to learn the importance and value of little things. Many fortunate ones were taught that a pebble diverting the course of a little mountain stream may change the course of a mighty river. In America—the land of little and big things, the land of opportunities—we are accustomed to seeing wonderful results from the smallest beginnings. In the winter, snow-flakes stop railroad trains; and in the summer, caterpillars do the same thing. Men have risen here as in no other country. From canal boat and log hut, to the highest place in the land, are well known facts. A dime in the hand of a thrifty boy has become a million dollars in his manly hand. Nowhere in all the world can there be found so many evidences of profit, accumulation and development as in America.

The great Woolworth Building, in New York, is a testimony to this fact, and a monument to this principle. The highest man-constructed building in the world, it has become a national attraction. Of highest artistic merit, its most graceful lines are the admiration of all who see it even if only in pictures. This great building, which represents a cost of twenty millions of dollars, is not a tribute to great wealth, but a greater tribute to the value of little things; it is the outcome of a profitable use of nickels and dimes.

The five and ten cent stores now established in every city, and which have even been imitated on the continent of Europe, have proved wonderful advantages to the great masses of people everywhere; the "thousand and one" necessities and commodities of every house have been produced according to the highest principles of the maximum of value, for the minimum of cost.

The result is that vast industries have sprung up, large stores employing a large number of young people respectably are in successful operation, every household is better equipped, many luxuries have been made necessities, and from the nickel of the poorest, to the millions of the rich, one great chain is linked to show the interdependence of the human family; and the noblest building of its kind in the world is the result, a monument, with a valuable lesson to remind the rising generation that which their fathers have proved; i. e., the "day of small things cannot be despised."

In like manner the moving picture is destined to the same results, the secret of its success lies in the fact that it is established on the strong and fundamental foundation of the nickel and the dime. The dollars are in the hands of the few, they are few and far between, they are often only representative value; the nickels and dimes are in everyones' hands, none are too poor, none are too young to possess them, they are the unlimited and universal evidence of a people's power, anything legitimate that comes within their range is on the certain and unhindered road to wealth and power.

Already, while the five and ten cent store with all its benefits is numbering its patrons from the thousands to the millions; the dimes of the moving picture are amounting to the millions and the billions; such a multiplication of units has never been seen in the world before. That which comes within the range of the small coins immediately comes within the power of the people, hence its instant popularity and assured success. Such has been the undisputed experience and history of the moving picture, such also is its positive future.

That there is an evil side to this principle must also be noticed only as a warning and to be avoided. Humanity is cursed with many evils which exist only on account of their small cost. If the deadly evils could only be made more costly they would soon be removed and the people benefited. The moving picture has at times been reduced to these depths, there were those who thought a small price meant cheap morals; highest principles do not throb in every human breast, but these highest principles can be inculcated wherever there is the small ability necessary to receive them. The object of this writing, therefore, is to point out to those who read it this valuable lesson that if they are interested in the moving picture they are interested in something that is founded upon the greatest foundation for most far reaching and enduring good.

At this early stage in the moving picture industry there are those who have made very great financial profit as a further proof of the principle herein expounded; there are those who have also built up great commercial enterprises with wide-spreading benefits to a large number of people; and by far the most important, there are the millions of people who have begun to look upon the moving picture as their standard amusement. A tremendous responsibility now rests upon all who have in any way the power to control or direct the course of any section of moving picture work; the tools they are using are those which build monuments, fortunes, and character; nay further, upon these there is being built the present and eternal good of the billions of today and the billions yet unborn. The world has never been given greater opportunities than those of these times, the world is always consistent, the present day privileges, coincident with the coming of the moving picture, are not accidental, the world moves in a wonderful harmony, everything is intended for the greatest good for the greatest number; that which is intended for the most universal benefit is founded upon such a basis that all may participate and enjoy, therefore the artistic, scientific, commercial, and educational benefits of the moving picture, with its unlimited and wonderful scope, would be lost to the world at large if it were not placed within their reach by means of the universal agency given to all mankind—the Nickels and the Dimes.

KALEM COMPANY WITHDRAWS PROPOSED NEW TRADE MARK.

Out of courtesy to the Vitagraph Company, the Kalem Company has withdrawn its proposed new trade mark "Broadway." Announcements were made simultaneously by both Kalem Company and the Vitagraph Company that each would issue a new brand of film under similar names. As the Vitagraph Company had gone much further in preparation for the use of the new name, Kalem Company decided to withdraw their new trade mark "Broadway," and selected another name, which will be announced later on.

Screen Club Has Mock Christmas

Billy Quirk Plays a 1914 Santa Claus and Hands Out Many Presents and Much Wit.

THE Screen Club held a mock Christmas on the evening of December 23. There was a goodly gathering of the members, and they brought their holiday spirits with them. In the parlor Billy Quirk sans makeup, which he described as the 1914 Santa Claus, 365 days ahead of them all, dispensed to the assembled members many kinds of presents. Most of them seemed to have been selected with a definite end in view, which fact the Santa Claus did not permit to escape the attention of the Screeners. For instance, Carl Laemmle drew a toy carpet sweeper, and to him Billy suggested that with it he was to do nothing but make a clean sweep. There was a bad minute when Glen White declined to take in good part the allusions to his past work. Billy tried to make it clear that he was only joking, but Glen said with increasing indignation that he was going altogether too far. Two of the members were on their feet with the intention of interfering when the two at the foot of the Christmas tree gently slid into a turkey trot and there was a sigh of relief. It was the only thing on the program that had been rehearsed.

Among those present at the Christmas entertainment were: Will Louis, Edwin Carewe, Billy Quirk, Arthur Hill, Oscar C. Apfel, George K. Roland, E. P. Longman, Ashley Miller, Harry Spingler, Hanford C. OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

AN impression prevails among some people not connected with the photoplay business that most of the players are unduly superior in their reception and treatment of patrons of the plays who seek their acquaintance. They do not seem to be able to understand why the players do not always bubble over with enthusiasm when called upon by visitors from distant points. One lady remarked when calling at a studio recently to gratify a desire to personally meet a photoplayer in whom she had become much interested on account of his work in the plays: "Why I did not think for a moment that so much red tape procedure was required for one to personally meet a photoplay actor. I realize that there is reason for one to become self-important to some extent when enjoying the admiration of the patrons of the moving picture houses, but I really cannot see excuse for an actor to so seclude himself that to effect a meeting with him is almost as difficult as securing an audience with the heads of royal circles. I am sure these players should feel honored that people travelling long distances should so arrange their plans as to be able to set aside time to visit them. The players should feel honored by the visits and help make the meetings less formal and hard to arrange."

There are hundreds of people who entertain the same notions as this lady and all of them are mistaken in their conclusions. As a rule, photoplayers are the most congenial people in the amusement world and approach to them, so far as personal disposition is concerned, is far more easy than arrangements for meeting players on the stage. The photoplayer realizes that his success depends upon the extent of his popularity with the patrons of the theaters. His inspirations spring from that popularity and his salary is measured by it. Therefore, the player is generally ready with the hearty hand shake and cordial smile when visitors seek him. But there can be too much of a good thing and the photoplayers are frequently driven to cover by their admirers.

Scores of cases can be cited where the players are imposed upon and made victims by thoughtless people who seem to think that photoplay work is a whirl of pleasure and that the studios are an edition of the cabaret order. People outside the studios have but a slight idea of how the players are pestered by letters and visits from silly, love-sick men and women. A prominent woman in the business, when receiving her mail at a studio, remarked: "Just look at that; eight fat letters, and I'll wager seven of them are from gushing strangers. Yes, I get some very sensible letters, but they are rare. Some people write of the interest they take in me from a professional standpoint and quite often make very interesting suggestions for my benefit. It is a pleasure to receive such letters and acknowledge them, but I cannot tolerate the correspondents who tell me how much they have become impressed by my charms and urge me to give them details as to how I make myself look this way and that way. Some actually ask me to give them a history of my life. They want to know all about my intentions professionally, matrimonially, and in all other respects. They have absolutely no regard for our right to at least some personal privacy. And the same thing is true of some visitors who are entire strangers."

A prominent director said the personal acquaintance mania had made his life miserable for some time. "Why," said he, "if I should meet all the people who seek me at the studios I would have to throw up my job for want of time to do my work. I realize that it is a great treat for people who come from distant points to personally meet players whom they have so often seen upon the screens in their home towns, and the gratification of their desire is a duty from a standpoint of courtesy as well as pleasure. Such meetings are frequently a source of much enjoyment to me, as I meet people who saw me perform in their far distant towns years ago and the reminiscences brought up revives interesting and pleasant recollections of times that antedated my work in the photoplay field. But I tell you it is aggravating to the extreme to be called from your work by some well-studied scheme on the part of visitors who start out by telling me how often they have heard their parents and grandparents speak of my good stage work and wind up by urging me to give some wonderful offspring a chance to appear in pictures."

A prominent player added his views on the acquaintance seekers by saying that the number of studio visitors is so enormous the players are often obliged to dodge them to protect their own interests. The players do not seek seclusion because of professional selfishness in the selection of acquaintances and associates. In this regard they are the same as people of all other professions, who have their respective clubs and other rendezvous. But in the majority of cases where acquaintance is sought the seeker has some axe to grind. "Why," said the player, "a total stranger in some mysterious manner succeeded in securing my home address after unsuccessfully trying to reach me at other places, and called upon me one night with a well prepared yarn that caused me to believe that there had really been a close acquaintance between us in former years. In balking an overture to enlist my influence towards getting employment for a relative, I asked the visitor how she had gained so much knowledge concerning my native place and professional career. With nonchalance that was almost staggering she told me that she had read an article in some publication frequently enough to commit the main facts to memory and sufficiently equip herself to pose as a friend of the earlier days."

* * *

A studio manager said the acquaintance seeker is a very delicate subject to handle. There is really no more excuse for such people to seek photoplay studios than there is for them to crowd at the stage doors of regular theaters. Still there is a difference between the ties formed by patrons of the latter houses and those of the photoplay houses. The latter feel that there is a more intimate relationship between themselves and the screen favorites. The amusement people never made favorites of as many people on the stage as they have of those who appear in pictures. The managers of regular theaters can exercise far more independence in dealing with their patrons than the photoplay exhibitor can. For instance, if a patron should complain to the former of some slight received from a player the managers could ignore it without fear that the patron would be able to exercise an influence against his business. No so with the exhibitor. The photoplay houses are parts of the respective communities and as such must be conducted to the satisfaction of the residents. Except, possibly, in cases where photoplays stand upon their own merits, a patron who so desires may at least to some extent use his influence to the disadvantage of an exhibitor by creating opposition on the part of his friends to certain plays, or players in them. If an exhibitor finds his business is dropping off for this reason he naturally informs the exchange that supplies him that his patrons do not like pictures of a certain make, or pictures featuring certain people; and the exchange in turn notifies the manufacturer that for some reason his productions are not popular in that locality. It's a case of a wheel within a wheel with the public as the chief mechanic. It will be seen, then, that the studio visitors must be handled very diplomatically, particularly those who travel distances with the anticipation of personally meeting their photoplay favorites. Upon the reception and treatment accorded them depends, in many respects, the amount of advertising the studio will get when the visitors return to their houses. It is a peculiar feature of the relationship that exists between the public and the photoplay, and it is an important one.

"The critics stand between the public and the regular theaters. In the photoplay field the public is the critic and its tastes must be respected. Many of the studios have found it necessary to assign certain days for visitors on account of the number of applicants, and this has, in a measure, curtailed the number without giving offence. As to the abuse of the privilege by job seekers, no one has thus far succeeded in combating it with success. The ingenuity exercised sometimes challenges admiration. Meanwhile the players will have to make the best of the conditions and be as graceful as possible when they get stung; because history shows that only one man was able to say 'the public be d—d' and get away with it; and the reason he succeeded was that he died before the public could get back at him."

MACHINE TAKEN FROM NEW YORK THEATER.

Mr. W. Schork, Mgr., advises that a Power's number six machine was stolen from his Theater Unique, on East Fourteenth Street, December twenty-third. The manufacturer's number is 715 and the license 3351. Exhibitors are warned against purchasing this machine and any information as to its present whereabouts should be promptly sent to Mr. Schork.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Forward and Back.

LOOKING backward over the twelve months just brought to a close, there is much cause for congratulation to be found in the increasing prosperity of the business. In New York building laws have been changed to remove some of the hardships under which the theaters suffered, and now a new class of house has come into existence, one that is far more pretentious than the old 299 seat houses and yet not so costly as the regulation theater. At the same time many onetime dramatic theaters have been swung into the photoplay column, and theatrical managers have followed the houses over into the picture field.

Since the cost of film of a certain grade does not vary, it follows that the house seating six hundred can give a better performance than the one with half that capacity. There is but one grade of film production instead of a graded quality as in the dramatic field, and the smaller house had to skimp on its film rental by employing run-down film instead of the newer and fresher product. The standard of acting is the same in a film on first run and a year old commercial, but it is seldom that a commercial service can give satisfaction because it is rarely that the films are in good condition.

One important factor in the advance is the rapidly growing interest in house programs and organs. The increase here has been fully one hundred percent, perhaps more, and few of the new issues have been discontinued. This is vastly different from the condition a few years ago when sheets of white paper pasted on crude boards and lettered with a marking brush was the only available advertising. Now theaters in the smaller towns and even the cities make use of the columns of the daily papers, employ one, three, eight and even larger stands, display photographs of the players and scenes from coming plays in actual photography and heralds are so cheap that it is expensive not to use them.

Advertising Lends Dignity.

In a word the photoplay theater has been lifted out of the class of the "store show" and into the category of the dramatic theater. There is something reassuring, something permanent to the use of lithographic matter prepared expressly for the film. Stripped paper has ever been the sign of the unstable and the cheap in theatricals. The home made sign has been the advertisement of the catch-penny exhibition. Today posters, used in moderation, give the house the final stamp of the established amusement. Only the abuse of lithographic matter is now to be decried, as well as the rented poster that is used over and over again. It is only in the very cheapest sections that extensive use of pictorial matter is permissible. As a rule a single sheet securely pasted to the board is worth half a dozen loosely tacked up or left flapping in the wind.

The public has come to learn the difference between the well conducted house and the cheap, impermanent house, and the abuse of posters is rapidly being done away with through their very use, for the excess of billing matter holds off the more profitable trade and so these houses are gradually being eliminated.

And with the poster covered house goes the old time exhibitor and comes in his stead the manager who is deserving of the name. Some of the old timers have learned their trade through study and experience and now class as managers, but the man who will not learn and who will not seek to improve is being forced to the wall.

Features.

For the first time in this country the past year has seen the dollar photoplay attraction in the regular theaters. It cannot be realized yet all that the Kleine "Quo Vadis" has done for the business as a whole. But it has definitely shown that the photoplay is not necessarily a five and ten cent attraction and slowly but steadily the prices are creeping upward. Even outside the larger cities there are many houses with prices up to twenty-five cents and many more that charge that much on special occasions.

On the Other Hand.

On the other hand two great evils have crept into the business, the pictorial discussion of the social evil and the over-long show. The former matter has been very thoroughly covered by Mr. Bush in a recent article. It is useless to recapitulate here. In all businesses there are men who look no further into the future than today. They take advantage of a chance to "clean up," make what they can and wander on to some other business, careless of the after effect of their actions. It would be unusual were there not a few of these attracted to the possibilities of the sensational film. There are not wanting men in all lines who have exploited the white slave traffic in sensational manner in the guise and in the name of reform. The daily papers, the magazines, the weeklies, the dramatic stage and the book publishers have all had their fling at it. It is only the comparative newness of the photoplay, its earlier and partly deserved evil name and the well meant but utterly misguided efforts of the reformers that make the photoplay presentation worse than the printed page or stage version. At the same time it must be remembered that much may be written that may not be shown, and the frankness of vision is worse than the frankness of language. About the only hope in this direction is that the craze will soon run its course and burn out through the very violence of its flame. At the same time the real manager should be alert to counteract in so far as may be possible, the pernicious results of this form of exhibition and make it plain that it is not the picture business as a whole, but merely a certain undesirable element that transgresses.

Eight Reel Shows.

An issue far more important is the manager who presents six and eight reels of pictures for five or even ten cents. Generally these are the remnants of an earlier day or men of the same mental equipment who, being unable to manage their houses so that they show a profit with a proper program, seek to attract the bargain hunter with quantity instead of quality.

It takes a lot of nerve to fight the eight reel show with three or four reels, but a series of good, clean-cut arguments should prove that the three or four reel show is better worthy of patronage and such a campaign will generally win out if the manager has the courage to persevere.

Taken by and large 1913 has been a year of progress toward greater prosperity and the better establishment of a permanent and profitable form of amusement. This progress should continue in the year newly born. It will witness the rise and possibly the recession of the multiple reel, and it may be that in 1914 the graded film will come and a production above the ordinary and with a star cast headed by some favorite command a better price per foot than one with a stock company and no especial pretension. That this is bound to come sooner or later is evident. That it is close at hand also seems to be apparent, and then the value of an entertainment will be gauged not by the number of thousand feet of film shown, but by the value of the players. This, to some extent, obtains in the case of the Famous Players, but so long as the production costing $300 and the one costing $3,000 sell at the same price per foot, it stands to reason that we shall have more of the $300 reels than the $3,000 presentations. We cannot expect the best results in either the manufacturing or the exhibiting end until merit and not merely footage decides the price.

Rex Runs.

The Rex Theater, Buhl, Idaho, sends in a bunch of good stuff. One of these is something along the lines of the recent "Public Notice" run in this department. With the exception of the top and bottom lines the text is in a ten-point of a heavy body, but hardly a full face. The top line is a 36-point cap line, WARNING.

Then the body type starts to explain that "If you are a resident of Buhl you are hereby notified that if you miss seeing—." Then follows the matter for the reel to be shown and at the close:

We believe everybody in Buhl will enjoy this splendid Rex Theater attraction, including, of course, the

CITY COUNCIL.

The text is set without paragraphing and should run ten to fifteen lines. It is best to use cheap newspaper, such as is usually used for such notices. If you've already used the Public Notice this may not work, but even at that you can adapt the idea.

Another idea is a narrow strip throwaway, three by eleven inches. Here the black type throws up the words "Throwing the bull at the Rex tonight." But between the words are four to six lines of type.

The slogan "See America First" is changed to "See Idaho First" for some Idaho scenics and this, very properly, takes precedence over the photoplays. As in all the Rex advertising the big lines and the name of the house are made to stand out well above the rest. There is only one bill in perhaps a dozen where the name of the theater is not as prominent as the name of the attraction, whether the name is put at the top, bottom or in the middle.

And it is refreshing to note that the Panama Canal is considered to be as well worthy of a special bill as a three part feature. It is a healthful sign when a house will feature the proper sort of an educational.

On the other hand here is a suggestion for "Heroes One and All" done in flaming red:

FIRE! FIRE!

Raging flames! Fire engines! Aerial trucks! All the thrills of a big city fire! Woven with artistic skill around an amusing love story, in two parts entitled,

"Heroes One and All"

Edison Ones.

At a time when most manufacturers are giving most of their time and thought to the multiple reels, it is pleasant to be able to record that the Edison company will cater to the manager who wants good singles. They will play up several series pictures, but will release in one reel lengths. In the rush to get aboard the multiple reel craze many are losing sight of the fact that hundreds of exhibitors do not make as much money with the multiples and demand good one reel programs. The Edison company will do much to supply this demand and it will make for them many friends. The one reel series stories are more flexible and more desirable in every way and with all the others hustling from two to five reels the Edison will have the licensed field to itself, with the one reel demand. Mr. Plimpton has spoken several times in no uncertain manner of his belief in the permanency of the one reel and we believe that he is right in his deductions.

Another Program.

The Faribault Theater, Faribault, Minn., sends in number two of its new program, "The Play-Bill." It is a twelve-page sheet on good paper and the contents back up the published statement that "This booklet goes home." There is plenty of gossip of the players. There is ample advertising for a starter, but it is so well distributed that it is not obtrusive. There is about a page and a half all told. Another page could be added, but the house uses its own advertising columns and to good advantage. At present it stands an excellent addition to the growing list.

In Line.

The Saenger Brothers theaters in Shreeveport are in line with the other Saenger houses in using the door knob specials, which is becoming the fad all over the country, it would seem. To make things interesting they give a free ticket for five consecutively numbered programs. They get a lot in a very little space.

Eight for Five and Ten.

The Electric Theater, Pearsall, Texas, runs eight reels for five and ten cents. It's mostly six months stuff that looks better on the advertising than it does on the screen, we imagine, but it is eight reels for a nickel, and a bad business. There is nothing in the English section of the bill to show that the five cent price is for children under nine, the advertising merely reading that the price is five and ten cents, but the lower half of the bill is in Spanish and here the fact is clearly stated. The English statement is misleading.

It would seem that the excessive length is used to kill off competition, but this is a bad way of fighting. Clean cut competition will make business for all, but an excessively long show at any price is to be deplored, for it will kill all of the business. It would seem that opposition advertising along lines that argue that it is not so much what you get as what it is worth would create a reaction of interest in favor of the same house.

Along the Same Lines.

And along the same lines comes a letter from H. R. Weber of the Star Theater, Chambersburg, who writes:

> I am sending you my latest timetable. I notice that six reels for five cents does not win your admiration. I can't say that it does ours either, especially when it comes to sending in the weekly check. But then circumstances alter cases, you know. I am just now enclosing programs for to-day from the other two theaters here and then you can see why it is thus. At one time we played vaudeville, too, but I found that I could do more business without it, but I must put on a show long enough to make our show look equal to the other fellows if we want to get the business. It pays because we are getting the business of the town, and the best people at that. With kindest regards.

The New Theater ran seven reels and one act of vaudeville for five cents, and the Rosedale a musical comedy company and three reels. Later the New Theater cut out the vaudeville and now advertises six reels and throws in premiums. This sort of thing is unhealthy competition and benefits no one. People would be better pleased with three reels of good pictures than with twice as many poor ones and in the present case the comparatively recent release dates on the subjects argues that the houses are paying more than they can afford for the purpose of fighting each other. It is a pity that nothing can be done, for in the long run it will react against the entire business and not merely against those who are to blame. There are fair and decent methods of meeting competition.

Changing.

Several weeks ago the Cameraphone dropped our name off its list. We don't know what got the goat of the Cameraphone publishers, but the East Liberty house still sends in its own program and from that we gather that the bulletins have switched to a colored cover in a very good imitation of lithographic work with a picture of some favorite on the front each week, Miss Beverley Bayne being on the one to hand. An imprint shows it to be the work of the "Exhibitors' Official Picture Story Magazine and Weekly Program." We should be glad to have the particulars of this large mouthful of name. It looks like a good idea.

Specific.

The other day—or the other two days—the Trianon Theater, New Orleans, one of the Josiah Pearce and Sons' houses, had "The House of Discord." They issued a special four-page folder with an attractively worded announcement on the front page, a two-page story and this definite announcement:

PLACE—Trianon Theater.
DATE—Sunday and Monday December 14 and 15.
TIME—10 a.m. to 11 p.m.

Practically everyone in New Orleans knows where the Trianon is, but for the benefit of the man who might be stopping at the St. Charles, we think they might have told where it was, for the rest is complete.

And possibly to correct the discord in the house they enclosed the musical program of ten numbers of the Tudor Theater. There are three soloists—evidently members of the orchestra, and the music runs three of Organist Lescale's selections with Bellini (mis-spelled "Bellim"), Balfe and Auber.

Now we are strong for music in the photoplay theater and we do not know how the music was used, but we hope that the orchestral program did not run through the pictures. The only fault we can find with the Savoy Theater here in town is that the music is permitted to interfere with the pictures. The band picks up a selection and plays it through and it doesn't matter a whoop in hades what is being shown on the screen, and always when the selection comes to an end there is applause no matter when this happens. They should take a large stick and beat it into the head of the director, that he is not supposed to be giving a concert, but playing the pictures. Fancy the orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House playing Paderewski's Minuet in spite of the fact that the poor opera company was supposed to be trying to sing Tannhauser! The comparison is not far fetched as it may seem. An orchestra in a theater is supposed to play what is on the stage, in this case the screen. It is not hired to give concerts. We do not know how the Tudor runs it. We do know that the program is a pretty piece of printing. We hope that they know what they are in the orchestra pit for.

We go to the picture theater to look at pictures. We want to hear the pictures played. We have no objection to an orchestral interlude, but let the band follow the pictures when the pictures are on.

Gaumont Advertising.

Here is a half-tone reproduction of the newest Gaumont idea in a lobby display for its features. The original is even more attractive. Alec Lorimore, their publicity manager, writes:

> I am sending herewith a black and white photographic print, which will probably give you some idea of what I spoke about. You can quite realize what a pretty and attractive lay-out this will be when printed on a soft paper and hand-colored. We propose to bring this out for our future releases, but the number that we shall be prepared to sell will be limited, as the whole thing will be costly and will be supplied to the trade considerably under cost.
> As you probably know, we have not given a great deal of display or advertising to our leading artists, but as the demands have been numerous and consistent for a long time, we have decided to make the novel departure of having a lobby display 24 x 28, putting nine portraits to each set-up and having these beautifully hand-colored. We have had quite fifty opinions from exhibitors calling at the office and the press generally, and, without exception, they say that these pictures are the best thing ever produced for the moving picture business.

We will add the fifty first opinion that this is one of the most attractive advertisements we have seen brought forward and we won't add "in the Moving Picture Business," either. It is the sort of material that would do credit to a two dollar attraction.

To the old timer (who does not have to be very old) it seems odd, now, to remember back to the times when it was impossible to obtain special posters—or scarcely any posters of any sort—when it was absolutely impossible to obtain the picture of any popular player and the only available advertising material was the "stock stuff" from the theatrical lithograph houses, when only two or three companies supplied even meagre quantities of press copy, and such a thing as a photograph of a scene from a play for lobby use was not even dreamed of. That was considerably less than ten years ago. Now a feature subject sometimes offers more good material for lobby and bill boards than theatrical attractions offer with high priced combinations.

Mr. Lorimore has contributed something new and distinctly good to the growing list.

Programs Pay.

Here's a letter from E. A. Lippert, La Sueur, Minn., who says:

> Have mailed under separate cover a few numbers of our program for criticism. Don't believe I ever would have started if it hadn't been for the Moving Picture World. You will notice that most of it is direct from the World.
> It has been a business getter and a person needs a business getter in a town of not quite 2,000. Have been in the picture business just six months and don't think I will ever get out of it. The town has been killed for any kind of a show by poor pictures and bad road attractions, so we have had a hard fight and have had to spend some money, but we are getting it now.

I will appreciate criticism on the weeklies very much. I would do almost anything to better them, if I knew what to do, because the people seem to like them and are getting so they reach for them when they are distributed.

Beyond question a good weekly program is the best possible business getter, particularly in a town that has been spoiled by the man who is not a manager and who never will be a manager, but who blunders into the picture business and does a lot of hurt before he gets out. It is an easy matter to shave yourself, but if you must cure yourself of the barber's itch before you can shave, it is a long wait. But it can be done, and Mr. Lippert seems to be doing it.

The Photoplay Weekly is a pretentious offering for a town of the size of Le Sueur. It is only four pages with a colored cover, the color varying, but an eight-pager is something for a two thousand town! Here is the bottom of the first page:

TWO SHOWS EACH EVENING

First Show at 8:00 O'Clock. Second Show at 9:00 O'Clock.

FEATURE NIGHTS

MONDAYS WEDNESDAYS FRIDAYS

Matinee—Every Saturday Afternoon

General Admission, 10 cents Matinee—Children, 5 cents

No street address is needed in a town so small, but the rest is all here. The other three cover pages are taken up by local ads, the first two white pages are chat and the other two the program. The program carries both day and date and gives the feature reel. The chat is chat. A great deal of it would be recognized by readers of this paper, but it is all new to the readers in Le Sueur, and it is good reading, stuff that interests the picture goers with just enough about the house to hold interest without tiring. We think that printing the cast would be a good plan, where casts may be had, it helps to hold the interest, but we do not know of anything else much that needs changing. It is not the finest sort of printing, but it is a good average job, and good enough, and it is intelligently handled. Until the sheet gets larger and can become more pretentious, it is plenty good enough. Some small changes might be made. For one we think we would cut out the colored cover and add four pages on white stock if we could get enough more advertising to pay for the type setting. The proportion of not more than half outside advertising should be preserved, but unless they get the colored stock very cheaply, we think that a twelve-page on white would be as cheap—on the paper end—as a colored cover and four pages in white.

From Selma.

Until we find something better we are going to hang the laurel wreath on the Academian, the publication of the Academy of Music, Selma, Ala. We have quoted pretty liberally from them lately because the house is run by a manager and not by a janitor and he "gets himself over" into his little publication. Lately we ran a quotation from the program on the multiple reel. This is the second chapter.

We were reading the proofs of that "Do You Want a Two-Part Feature Every Day?" on the night of "Within the Law" when the "Old Showman," who was acting manager of that company, happened to notice the story.

"There's nothing to that," he declared. "People do not take their amusement that way. They'll never think about whether they want any certain kind of thing or not, nor even know that they do want it, but if they happen into this house and like what they see, they'll come back; if they don't they will not. And any reason they tell you for it is all bunk. They just came to have a good time, and had it or did not have it, and there it ends with them. And they might tell you all day that they wanted something, then decide that they want something else anyhow."

"No, nothing like it," we told him. "Here they know what they want and come when they get it, just like they go to a store they like, or buy the kind of breakfast food that appeals to them."

"All right, young man, go to it. But who do you suppose told Selwyn that people wanted 'Within the Law?' Said instead that melodrama was dead for a century, and now look at 'em. Your little stunt is all right, but you'll never find out anything that way. If they like the stuff you are giving them, they'll come, and as long as they come, you ought to be satisfied. When they quit, get 'em something else."

And he was right. A disappointing number of answers came to that appeal, and of those that came a great number meant nothing, being signed by one person for another. And many—nineteen to be exact—did not even think enough to express a preference, even tho' they did hand in the coupon. We take back not a word of it that we want to give you what you want, and we are not anxious to find out what you do want by the old showman's method, but we see no sure way out of it except by continuing to get for you the things which we think are good and trusting to you to like 'em.

The offer is open. If you know of something you want, some particular picture, or class of picture, we'll do our best to get it for you.

Lately the house has been using a scheme that required a coupon to be clipped from the program and returned. The scheme has been discontinued as it was found that some families were getting a dozen or more copies just for the sake of the coupons.

Williams in a New Place.

No, Bert Williams has not changed his address again, but he has come out with a new publication, the Motofilmic Advertiser, that is to be the organ of the International League of Motofilmic Advertisers; in other words, his league of program publishers. The heading of the first copy says the subscription price is "$1.go" a year. We don't know how much a "go" is, but the sheet is worth it if you want to get out a program. If you'll write him, at Fairmount, Minn., he'll probably tell you whether he means a dollar or a dollar and a half.

Bucyrus Is There.

B. E. Elberson, of the Majestic Theater, Bucyrus, Ohio, makes his debut in this department with a couple of programs and a letter in which he writes:

I find that a number of the boys have sent you copies of their house programs and just to show you and them that the little city of Bucyrus is on the map I enclose you copies of the "Majestic Weekly," which, as you will see, that it is issued every week and during the holiday season. I have added a cover to use for local advertisers and to give me two more pages of reading matter I have found it to be one of the best advertising mediums that I have ever used, and by the way, I have not stopped to the newspapers and billboards because I have this house organ.

I have found the columns of your department to be of great help to me in filling the reading columns of the Majestic Weekly, and I also wish to state that it was through the Advertising Department of The Moving Picture World that I tackled what was a big job at first.

If you have any suggestions to make that will help me to make this a better weekly I will be glad to have them, and any of the boys that would like to have one of these papers can get same by sending the postage.

The misspelled word contest that I have on the last page (although an old one) has made the paper popular and was one of the things that made the patrons ask for them. I issue these programs every Saturday and distribute them at the theater as the patrons leave the theater, which I have found to be the best plan.

That's Right.

Note that he gives out his programs as the audience is leaving the house. It may not seem to matter much, so long as it gets into the hands of the patrons, but it does. Give them to them going in and they will look at them in the half-light and perhaps let them drop during the performance; but give them out as the house is emptying and they are more apt to slip them into their pockets or muffs to take home.

Ordinarily the sheet is an eight pager about six by nine inches on good paper. A cut takes the first page, and six of the inside pages give a two- or three-inch advertisement for the day, the rest of the page going to chat of the players and releases. Only the back page is given to the outside advertiser. The extra number carries eight and a plate cover with three pages of foreign advertising. Most of the pages carry a column cut of some player, and the grade of paper used permits the cuts to show up well. Mr. Elberson apparently believes that advertising is a good thing, so he uses it himself instead of getting out an advertising program and giving the best of it to the outsiders. When the outsider demands more he puts on more pages instead of cutting down on his readers. This is a point that so many managers miss. If they get more foreign advertising they merely cut down their own allowance, though most of them started the scheme in the first place to advertise themselves.

The mis-spelled word is the usual working of the scheme, fifty-one tickets being awarded each week in five prizes.

Day and date are given for each day and no attempt is made to tell the story of the films in the program space, the feature or leading players being picked up. Those who have recently written for program help will do well to take advantage of Mr. Elberson's offer of copies.

Bleich Advertising.

George A. Bleich, of the Empress, Owensboro, Ky., takes three inches across page to advertise a concert singer and in a box, adds:

There will be No Advance in the Prices for this Occasion. It's My Treat, and I Want All My Patrons to Enjoy this Fine Offering.
GEORGE A. BLEICH.

And here's a paragraph from his regular advertising that explains why he had to enlarge the seating capacity of his house to 850:

Now that this amusement place has been in operation more than a year, you will agree that it is everything its owner said it would be, and certainly it enjoys that desired reputation for Cleanliness of Entertainment, and a place Worthy of Your Patronage.

Sure Thing! There is an occasional "punk" show seen here, but they are mighty few, and should not be charged to us. But did you ever visit here and at least not get a dime's worth of entertainment? Why, the music is worth the admission price, if there were no pictures to look at.

AND HAVE YOU EVER SEEN THIS THEATER SEEK TO GAIN BUSINESS BY ADVERTISING AND SHOWING SENSATIONAL OR LURID PHOTOPLAYS? Crime, Murder and Arson are absent from the plays seen in this theater, likewise the "Racy" and Unclean Morally. The Empress is indeed a fit place for your daughter, boy, wife or sister, and you know it now.

That's the sort of talk that counts, providing that it is true talk and you can honestly say that you have kept out the fifth and vulgarity that creeps into the films.

Hip Gets "Quo Vadis?"

The Hippodrome Theater, Williamsport, Pa., sends a quarter-page advertisement of the Kleine-Cines "Quo Vadis?" which was shown at thirty-five and fifty cents for three days and E. B. Linck, the manager, writes that the engagement was a huge success. This is advertised as the first showing of the big feature in the picture houses, and it makes a modest brag over the fact. The advertising is largely a reader, only about a third being in display, and seems to have been taken from the company press matter in part, though the local additions are written in the same vein of dignified explanation. There must have been a strong temptation to "circus" the advertising, but the sober announcement is far better and more in harmony with the subject. There is a great deal in keeping the advertising in harmony with the attraction, and here the safe course has been followed.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Two Markets.

HERE are two new markets, but please make a distinction between a market and a waste basket. Frank Woods says that about ten thousand scripts came in the first two weeks following the announcement that he was in the market and most of them were unutterably bad. No one buys that sort of stuff and the author who sends it out wastes postage.

Carl L. Gregory, of the Princess brand of the Mutual Film Corporation, writes that he is in the market for one-reel dramas and now and then a comedy. Scripts should be addressed to him at the Thanhouser Studio, New Rochelle, N. Y. They should be addressed to Mr. Gregory, Princess brand, and not merely to Thanhouser, which is not in the market.

Mrs. Catherine Carr, of the North American Films Corporation, 111 Broadway, New York City, is in the market for clean one, two and three-reel dramas and one and two-reel comedies. She says she wants only the best, and she means what she says.

Visioning in Thoughts.

A reader wants to know how he can show a player's thoughts in a play and hits upon the solution in the suggestion that a vision is needed. He wants to know how to use a vision. The old style vision was simply written.—John sits in chair and thinks—vision of his wife appears in corner of picture—vision fades—John rises—exits.

In the new form the vision is written as a separate scene and is run as such. John sits and starts to think. The scene is faded down, a full screen vision of the wife fades in and out and going back to the previous setting we fade John in again. This involves only one handling of the film and by fading one scene down and the next up instead of having one scene fade into the next, we save much time and trouble. A better way would be to run a leader, "The thought of his wife dissuades John from his purpose." The best way would be to change the action so that this, in itself, suggests John's thoughts.

Use No Hooks.

We had hoped that this caption had been retired for good, but it seems that Western Universal is growing increasingly careless of the property rights of authors and doesn't seem to care, at least James Dayton has made no reply to a letter written some time since regarding this matter and the nuisance has not been abated. One recent rejection from the Pacific Coast Studios carries the name of Henry in a boyish hand on the back of the script. Henry should be provided with a blank pad to amuse himself with. If you send to Universal don't kick if someone uses it for a memorandum pad and then sends it back to you.

Kitchell's Scheme.

William H. Kitchell has revised his card catalogue record of scripts and offers the simplest scheme yet. Each story has its numbered card on which is written the title and the length. Below are given the names of the companies to which the script has been submitted and the going and return dates. The cards are shifted between "On the Road," "Retired for Revision," and "Sold." The bookkeeping is done on cards on which the sales are entered in regular order. This is the simplest system to date, though we confess to a preference for special guide cards for the companies with which we do business regularly that we may see at a glance just how much stuff they have on hand.

Not So.

Recently we saw a letter from the head of one of the so-called schools in reply to one on which a correspondent alluded to the fact that we did not like the schools. The "Professor" wrote that our objection to the schools was based on the fact that we wrote scripts and like the other professional writers wanted to keep the field limited to ourself. He added that much that what we wrote was planned to discourage the beginner.

This is pure rot. We offer very little of our own work to the open market, but if we did attempt to sell generally we would, for purely business reasons, welcome the advent of others who could write good grade stuff if for no other reason than that a sufficient supply of really good material would help our sales by making the manufacturers less dependent on the studio writers and more inclined to purchase from the open market.

We are trying to discourage the efforts of the school pupil who has been led to believe that because he has purchased a "course" he has learned to write pictures, and who blames on the stupidity of the editors instead of his own inability to write, his failure to sell scripts, but we welcome all who are competent to write good grade material because we realize that with two or three hundred reasonably good writers offering material in the market, there would be a wider field and a better sales proposition for those already writing good mateial and not connected with any particular studio. We are trying to discourage the malcontent incompetent, but we give help, in and out of this department, to those who are worthy of help.

We object to the schools because they are not helpful, because they are not sufficiently familiar with their work to give aid and because they encourage hundreds of ignorant to believe that they can write.

Heroes.

Lately there was released a story with a most dismal sort of hero. He was lost when very young and when he grew up he was bound out by the orphan asylum to a cruel farmer who made him pitch hay and carry water and do a lot of other things that most farmer's hired men do. He didn't like the job and flopped all over the place until he was given money to run away to the big city. Even there he didn't get a job but he did find his long lost parents, and the presumption is that he never did another stroke of work.

That's no sort of hero. If he had pitched in and pitched hay, if he had shown an ability to go up a short flight of stairs without falling all over his feet, if, in a word he had acted like a man instead of a loafer we would have been pleased when he found his rich papa, but by the time he was found by his parents the disgust had grown so strong that no one had any use for him.

Make your hero, your central character, command respect and admiration. Give him backbone and hustle. If the central figure is a woman make her a person to like and become interested in. Have her do things that win respect. A story, after all, is a story of people and a story of people is not interesting unless the people themselves are likable.

The Inquest Club.

Although the last meeting of the Inquest Club was held in Christmas week, there were few absentees and about forty gathered in the Morgue to discuss the day's first runs they had just witnessed at the Savoy, where all of the licensed first runs are now shown each day.

Mrs. F. Marion Brandon and Pop Hoadley were the star witnesses and their spirited discussion of conditions held the interest almost to the exclusion of the pictures. By request of the Coroner Mr. Hoadley repeated to the Inquesters his remarks at the last Ed-Au meeting on the necessity for giving to the photoplay the very best that is in one.

During the chat it developed that apparently Eclair does not mind what other companies might regard as an excess of leader, but Mr. Hoadley and others were prompt to point out that this was purely a local condition and that the script that was made clear without the use of leader was to be preferred.

It was also developed that a mollycoddle hero who falls upstairs with a pail of water and wilts against a hay rack without any real effort to fork hay is hardly to the liking of the average patron, who cannot got interested in a quitter. A Christmas story that apparently was written to fit an idea was not favorably commented upon, but an Edison was liked and a Lubin received fair praise.

Owing to the fact that there is a fifth Monday in December, the next meeting of the club will be January 12. To join the club it is only necessary to be at the Savoy Theater, in West 34th Street, near Broadway, on that evening and join the others in the lobby when the slide is flashed on the screen. And, by the way, the thanks of the club are due the efficient management of the Savoy for the use of this slide.

Which?

Here is a pretty little proposition that comes from one of our readers:

> I would like to ask a few questions and trust you will answer if you see fit. When I first began writing scripts they all came back with a reason checked and no comments. Now they stick a while, and then come back, but with a word from the Editor. In summing up all the remarks made by Editors I am convinced that my ideas are not for picturization, but for short stories. More than one Editor has told me that the idea could be made into a capital short story. This applies to several scripts submitted.
> Do you believe that if I continue writing scripts, that I eventually will land? Providing, of course, that I keep on improving. Or, do you believe I should try short stories? If the latter, will you tell me how to prepare MSS and where and how to submit.

There is no data on the correspondent's ability as a plot builder, nor his experience as a writer of prose, and it is not easy to give a definite ruling, but it seems to us that generally speaking the writing of plays offers the better market.

This writer has had the usual experience of having his early work rejected while later efforts give evidence of having been considered. This is almost always the rule. It is practically impossible for the beginner to win immediate success, but perseverance, when accompanied by practise must bring improvement.

On the other hand it is clearly apparent that he is originating fiction instead of photoplay plots. To express it more understandably, he is inventing plots in which description and mental processes are more important to the story than the action. He is writing material that is better expressed in words than in acted motion.

He might take these ideas and put them into story form, but the writing of fiction requires the possession of a well placed literary style and it may require years to acquire this style to a sufficient degree to be able to write salable stuff. In photoplay it is merely necessary to state the actions that tell the story. In fiction the author is deprived of the assistance of the actors in interpreting his ideas. He must vivify his paper people, and this, to most, is a more difficult art. We think that the balance is in favor of the photoplay, particularly if quick results are aimed at. Given ability to create plots, the dramatic sense to fully display these plots and a comprehension of the technique of the camera and success may come in from six months to a year or two. It is seldom that the fiction writer finds success so early—and by success we do not mean an occasional sale, but a small but fairly steady income.

There are many excellent books of writing stories and we shall be glad to give the titles if a stamped and addressed envelope is sent for that purpose. The preparation of the manuscript is simple. It is merely necessary to write the story on the usual 8½ by 11 inch paper, using double spacing. They are submitted to almost any magazine with the usual return envelope, but it is useless to try and do a marketing business without the trade papers, for the work of authoring has its trade papers, and some of them contain valuable literary market reports of the constantly changing demands.

Most authors who can write both fiction and photoplay prefer photoplay as yielding a larger return for the actual time invested. The author who prefers fiction work is generally the man who sells style rather than ideas, and whose style is of no value in a photoplay.

Writing To Titles.

"I hate to rewrite the story, because that means I must change the title, and it's such a good one."

That is an extract from an actual conversation, but it is no way to look at it. The title advertised the fact that the production was not practicable, and the title had a bearing only on this one unimportant incident that was unproducible. The elimination of the incident meant a change in title, but it also meant a probable sale—yet the author thought only of his beloved title.

It is very true that sometimes a good title will sell a story, but only when the story backs up the impression the title makes. It is much easier to write a new title than to sell a badly planned story.

Speed.

Don't be in a hurry. If you can't write your story in proper form to-day, there is always a to-morrow and there will still be a demand for stories to-morrow and the day after.

Lately a new writer got lost in a two-reel story. There was about six hundred feet of plot, but he had read that two-reel comedies were wanted and without waiting to perfect himself in the one-reeel he tackled the double. He was advised to study the route and try again, but with only a glance at the map he made a second trial and fell down just as hard as before and in the same place.

Now a writer like that will never get anywhere until he starts to work in the right way. The Marathon winner doesn't start in to run twenty-six miles a day. He starts as a short-distance man, and as he gains experience through practice he increases his course until at last he can go the route. If he started right in to run the full course the first attempt he would not last, and if he persisted his friends would be put to the expense of buying flowers.

It is the same way in writing plays. First learn what a story really is. Learn the difference between a story and an incident. Henry W. Thomas, editor of the Top Notch Magazine, in a recent market want in the Writers' Magazine tells it in a nutshell when he says:

> Thousands of writers are wasting their energy turning out fiction because they don't know what a story is. They mistake an incident for a story. The reason for rejecting ninety-nine manuscripts out of a hundred is that there is no story. Thousands of writers go on for years without ever knowing what the elements are that constitute a story; editors try to make them understand, but in vain. Such writers, if they send their wares to fiction magazines, have a starvation time of it. The most thrilling incident that life ever produced is not a story; it may be the foundation for one or the nucleus from which a story may be evolved.
> Most writers get their stuff back because they think that by elaborating an incident they are developing a story. It takes more than an adventure to make a story. There must be characters moving amid that adventure and a play of conflicting motives. An adventure may suggest a story, but never is it a story in itself.

No matter how perfect your technique of form may be, it is a thing dead without the vivifying soul of the plot. But with the plot obtained, it must be developed to the fullest possible point. Shakespeare's Othello is simple in its bare plot. Iago, coveting Desdemona, seeks to rouse Othello's jealousy that Desdemona, discarded, may become his own. That is the germ. A master mind made an undying story of it. Hundreds of others, using precisely the same germ, have written piffle.

But given the technique of plotting, there still remains the technique of form to be mastered. Your idea must be conveyed to the man who will produce it, and it must be conveyed concisely and yet with entire clearness. Learn what a scene is and learn to write scenes before you enleavor to write a series of scenes. Take a single incident and work that out alone. A single incident is not so complex as to cause you to become lost in its various developments.

Now you are ready to start in to write, but even with a good foundation you are not yet able to write a long script properly. Edit, revise, rewrite, not once but fifty times, if need be. Don't expect to sell or even offer for sale your first plot. Put it aside. Some day you may take it from the lavender and, seeing how pitiful a thing it is, give it new form and new life, but you cannot do it offhand. Take your time.

Don't be in a hurry. Seventeen years ago a group of trained men, writers of amusements for the daily and weekly papers, stood in the bar of the old Union Square Hotel in New York. There was Burton, of the Sun, McLoughlin, of the Mirror, Whitton, of the Clipper, this writer, then on the Dramatic News, and others. We had just seen the first showing of the Lumiere Cinematograph at Keith's and were talking it over. Not a man in the crowd, save J. Austin Fynes, then the manager of Keith's, gave it more than three years to run, and most of them were within a year, and not one of them dreamed of the development of to-day, though every man in the crowd was supposed to be an expert on amusement matters.

You do not have to sell your script to-morrow in order to get in before the pictures cease to exist. Do not look at the check of next week, but at the opportunity of the years to come. Prepare yourself by patient, persevering effort against that even better day, and do not hurry, for haste is fatal to success. It's worth working for and it is worth waiting for. You will have to work and have to wait if you would win. Be prepared to.

Common Sense.

Here is a line from an article in the Writers' Magazine that beginners should frame and read every day. It is by Coningsby Dawson, author of "The Garden Without Walls." He speaks as a fiction writer and to fiction writers, but it is as applicable to photoplay:

> Becoming a writer is like becoming an architect, a lawyer, a doctor—like joining any one of the skilled professions. It takes years of work to accomplish proficiency, let alone perfection. You'd think a man a fool if, coming straight out from college and seeing the Metropolitan Tower, he said, "Ha! I'll be an architect. I'll build a tower in Chicago exactly like that." You'd know at once that he couldn't. He'd have to spend fourteen years in learning how. But any young person who has read Thackeray, possesses an admiring family and has access to paper and pen, thinks that to be a successful writer all the equipment necessary is the desire. Make no mistake about it, desire's only the egg from which the bird may ultimately be hatched. * * * * And there's no reason why any writer who is a writer should be discouraged. Somewhere at the back of his head, the man who was born to spill ink knows that his day is coming. No one can hasten it but himself—by work.

Two Letters.

Mrs. Brandon, of the Eclair Company, sends a letter that accompanies a script from McKeesport, Pa. It reads:

> "Within the Law" will be found enclosed in motion picture form. I suppose you have your own staff of scenario writers, but I wish you would kindly give me consideration, because this famous play would be sure to make a hit in picture form. If of any value, remit to ———.

No copyright release goes with the script; apparently this young genius never heard of that. Two recent infringements innocently made—cost $2,000 and $2,500 respectively, yet this author calmly proposes to sell stolen goods.

This letter is written in a hand that suggests the possession of some intelligence, but Omer F. Doud, George Kleine's publicity man, sends one that beats it. It is written in unformed hand and starts off:

> I will tell you that I am selling my moving picture plays storys very fast as fast as I can write them. I have ten companys that buy my plays storys. Each of them pay me from $100.00 to $200.00 per plays storys. They pay me more and more every week. I write all kinds of moving picture plays storys Frontier, Bison, Imp, Champion, Victor, Rex, Eclair, Powers, Nestor and Gem comedies, virile, dramas, western environments, military cowboy and spectacular two and three reels features, Indians. I write nineteen storys of each. Please write me two or three letters a week. Let me hear from you within one or two days.
> Please keep my address

And some people wonder where the correspondence schools find their victims and why so many writers complain of poor treatment! This seems to be one of the answers.

The number of persons who want to know how they can steal copyrighted plots is surprisingly large. They cannot think plots for themselves, so they steal. Most of them lack the honesty of the McKeesport young man, but they make the same mistake.

Mystery Stuff.

Phil Lang has promised an early article on the mystery story, but meantime here is a useful hint: Do not make your story so mysterious that even the editor is left guessing at the end of the last scene.

Inquiries

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answer here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

RUBENA—Thanks for the card—but why no questions lately?

M. S. R.—The next time you ask for entire casts, things will happen to you at the Ed-Au club. Guy Coombs was the minister, and Miss Anna Nilsson the teacher, in "The Breath of Scandal."

M. J. C.—We do not like the concern you mention, though we have no positive knowledge of their work. Better keep away. Send a stamped and addressed envelope for the list of addresses, including Mutual.

A. H. H.—Watch the announcements of the various animated weeklies. We do not know whether such pictures were made.

SEVERAL INQUIRERS—William Nigh is the Keystone Izzy. He is also called K. Yamamoto in a recent Majestic

D. D.—Bud Colt was Herschell Mayall.

T. W. G.—The K-B Identifier did not see "Fatty Joins the Force," but believes that your question indicates Miss Dot Farley, who played with the other companies you mention. No data on that Biograph. You are right in your contention that the cast is best appreciated when thrown on the screen last, but a better plan still, is to hang it up in the lobby, where it may be studied at leisure. This is done in many houses now.

Technique of the Photoplay

(Second Edition)

By EPES W. SARGENT

Not a line reprinted from the first edition, but an entirely new and exhaustive treatise of the Photoplay in its every aspect, together with a dictionary of technical terms and several sample scripts.

One hundred and seventy-six pages of actual text.

Special chapters on Developing the "Punch," Condensing the Script, Writing the Synopsis, Multiple Reel Stories, Talking Pictures, Copyrights, etc.

In cloth, two dollars. Full leather, three dollars.

By mail postpaid. Add ten cents if registration is desired.

Question No. 14.

BEST answer will be published and names of others sending in replies of excellence will be published in the "Roll of Honor."

Suppose you have a motor generator set and in this set there develops a pounding. What would you look for, and what remedy would you apply?

Roll of Honor.

The answers to Question No. 8 present a queer mix-up. Everyone seems to have mis-read the question. Some splendid replies dealing with the installation of a motor generator set have been received, but in most instances the location of the various devices pertaining thereto (ammeter, voltmeter and field rheostat) have been either almost entirely overlooked, or else dealt with very briefly. Good general replies on the installation of motor generator sets have been sent in by W. L. Johnston, Toronto, Canada; L. C. LaGrow, Albany, N. Y.; Philip Glaser, Paducah, Ky.; Fort Worth, Texas; St. Paul, Minn.; Burlington, Iowa; San Francisco, Cal.; and Denver, Colo. (Those answering questions must give explicit consent to the use of their names, otherwise the reply will be credited to the city only.)

Answer to Question No. 8.

The reply of Joseph L. James, Camden, N. J., has been selected as the best answer to the question.

The Question:

Suppose your employer purchased a motor generator set and instructed you to go ahead and install it. Tell us in detail where you would locate it, and the various devices appertaining thereto, explaining in detail your reasons for the selection of each location.

The Answer:

Outside of the motor-generator itself there are three principal appliances pertaining thereto—the voltmeter, the ammeter and the field rheostat. The motor-generator itself should be located in a room immediately adjoining the operating room, provided a sufficiently firm foundation can be had to prevent vibration. It is best, however, and very much best too, that the floor of this room be separate from the floor of the operating room, since it very frequently happens that the armatures of the motor generator set will be sufficiently out of balance to create a slight vibration, and this vibration may be sufficient to effect even the most solidly built floor. Now if the motor generator sets on the same floor with the projection machine, and this condition be present, it might seriously affect results on the screen. But that is not the question. The ammeter and voltmeter should be located as nearly as possible in front of and within plain view of the operator. If there is only one projector, the voltmeter should be on one side and the ammeter on the other side of the observation port. If there be two machines, then these instruments should be located beside the observation port of the left hand projector, but both instruments should be on the right hand side of the port in this case. The field rheostat should be within easy reach of the operator when in operating position at either projector. If there be but one projector, then it is best located immediately underneath the observation port. If there be two projectors, then its location would depend somewhat upon the type of machine used. But an effort should be made to place it where it can be handily reached from either machine. Probably the best location, where there are two machines, would be just to the left of and near the top of the upper magazine of the right hand machine.

My reasons for these locations are as follows: The main use of the ammeter and voltmeter is to enable the operator to keep the voltage of the generator at its normal, by means of the field rheostat, and to avoid any overloading of the generator, or to inform the operator when he has an overload. But the voltmeter and ammeter, however, have another exceedingly important office, viz: to enable the operator to ascertain at exactly what arc length his lamp produces the maximum light with the minimum wattage consumption. This is a very important matter indeed, but which will not prove of any large value unless the voltmeter and ammeter be so placed that they will be under the constant and close observation of the operator, and the most logical way to accomplish this is to place them on either side of the observation port through which he is constantly looking. But to make this effective the field rheostat must also be very handily placed, else the operator is more than likely to become careless in attending to slight adjustments. He is likely to say: Oh, well, if the boss doesn't care enough about it to locate things where they ought to be, "I should worry"—and let it go at that.

New York Operators' Ball.

M. P. M. O. Local Union No. 306 will give its annual ball at the Manhattan Casino, 155th Street and Eighth Avenue, Saturday evening, January 24, 1914. Preparations are being made to entertain a very large crowd and it is confidently expected that the coming ball will far eclipse all efforts of the past. Evidence of this is shown in the fact that the union has secured the Manhattan Casino, an enormous hall capable of holding 6,000 people. The boys who make the movies have a world of friends in New York, and large as that hall is, it undoubtedly will be filled to overflowing. The New York operators have established the reputation of being first class entertainers, therefore those who spend the night of January 24 with them may expect all kinds of a time that evening, and the usual regrets next day.

Incidentally let me remark that Union No. 306 is progressing very nicely. Its officers call at the office of the editor every once in a while and I understand that everything is running smoothly, and the membership climbing as fast as is desirable.

And this gives me the chance to say that membership can climb too fast. It is all right to have lots of members, regardless of their quality, from one point of view. A sponge has its uses; it is big and looks very nice, but it squashes up mighty easily, and it is not of much force anyhow. It is a very easy matter to construct a great, big sponge of an organization, but it is much slower work to build a compact, solid one that is welded together with a cement that will hold. When trouble comes the organization constructed from solid material (in this case operators who understand their business and are willing to apply their knowledge and put the results on the screen) will be able to accomplish things, although it is not so very large in members, whereas the overgrown sponge will strike the wall of trouble with a splutter, a shower of water and—the wall of trouble is right there where it was before, doing business at the old stand, and it hasn't even so much as a dent. Let Local Union No. 306, and all other unions as well, use only good, sound brick in their building, rejecting half-baked bats (there are lots of that article in New York City), and in the course of time they will have a structure they will be proud of, and which will be an effective tool with which to raise the structure of increased salaries and improved conditions.

There I have mixed several things up together, but one thing just led to another. I am sure the ball will be a success, and anything I, individually or as editor of this department, can do to make it so will be done, and done with the best good will in the world.

Those Questions.

On page 1278, December 13 issue, I said that I would send a complete list of questions if a sufficient number of operators wanted them badly enough to pay 25 cents, and provided they made that fact known immediately. Sufficient response has been had to justify the compilation and the sending out of the questions, which will be done as soon as possible. Now, gentlemen, don't get impatient. The editor has been flat on his back in bed for the past two weeks, and has had something of a struggle to keep up with even the ordinary work, but a complete list will be made up as soon as practical and will then be mimeographed, and sent out and all those forwarding 25 cents will receive the same. One reader said he was opposed to the sending out of the questions all at once. He thought they might better form a sort of an examination, but he had the grace to say that probably I knew best. Well, brothers, the whole germinal idea of the questions was and is to induce operators to study. There is no examination needed. I know what the conditions are, and they are bad enough, believe me, taking the country as a whole.

Now, I figured it out that 25 cents would probably just about cover the expense, and that the sending out of the questions would give operators ample time and induce them to study, so that they could make an intelligent answer when the time came. It is not a matter of "cramming" for a few weeks, but a matter of genuine study. I would request all of you who want these questions to send in your 25 cents as soon as you can, either by money order, in my name, or by silver, or two-cent postage stamps.

Edison Guarantee.

The Edison Manufacturing Company informs this department that its machines are sold with the warranty that they are mechanically perfect and that the company will replace, without charge to the purchaser, any part which shows any defect within one year from date of sale, provided the part be shipped back, charges prepaid ,for inspection. It calls undivided attention, however, to the fact that this guarantee automatically terminates the moment any other than Edison parts are used on the machine to which it applies.

The Edison Company also informs us that it is now ready to install the new helical gears and gear guard, recently described in the department, the charge for same being $25.00. It strongly recommends, however, that the mechanism be sent to the factory in Orange, where the changes can be made under the direction of its own mechanics. Express charges should, of course, be prepaid.

Installing a Motor Generator Set.

Fort Worth, Texas, sends in a reply to Question No. 8, which really is not a reply to the question at all, since the voltmeter and ammeter are only casually mentioned. The letter is so excellent, however, when it comes to dealing with the general installation of a motor generator set, that I will publish it; not as a reply to Question No. 8, but as a most creditable setting forth of the various points to be taken care of in the installation of a motor generator set.

(1) I would have the manager buy a machine that had the following qualifications, viz: the voltage, capacity and type suitable for the purpose for which they are to be utilized. (2) Construction of the most solid character, and guaranteed in every way. (3) That it have a good finish, as it would more likely get better care. (4) The machine should be as simple as possible. (5) The amount of attention required should be small. The screws and nuts should be reduced to a minimum and provided with a locking device so they cannot jar loose. The brushes should be capable of being easy to adjust and self-feeders, so they may make up for any slight eccentricity of the commutator. The bearings should be self-oiling and self-aligning. (6) The machine to be of a standard type, so that the parts are interchangeable. (7) The machine should be symmetrical, well proportioned, compact and solid in form. (8) It should have ample capacity for the work to be done. It should also be guaranteed not to heat up any part of its winding to more than 50 degrees Centigrade, after a run of six hours under rated load conditions (by resistance measurement). And if it is not shunt wound must be able to carry 25 per cent. overload for two hours and 50 per cent. momentary without excessive heating or sparking. I would place it in the operating room if the room was large enough, or the law allowed it. I would select a place which was perfectly dry, free from dust or grit, well lighted and well ventilated, and so arranged that there would be space enough to remove the armature without moving the machine. Reason for the selection of a dry place is that the machine will give better service, not liable to ground or short, and will not rust or corrode. It must be free from dust and grit because it would fill the field full of dirt, and you would thus be compelled to clean it daily in order to secure the best service, also it is liable to make the brushes spark and scratch badly, or burn the commutator or armature, and it would have a very short life, besides not delivering the goods. Plenty of light is necessary that one may see and detect anything which might be wrong. Good ventilation is required, as the machine needs it to keep it at the proper temperature. It is not essential that a special foundation for the machine be supplied, but the floor should be solid enough to prevent vibration, because if the machine vibrates it is very likely to cause several troubles. I would also see to it that the floor was level (with a spirit level) since one end being lower than the other would have a bad effect on the machine bearings and other parts. In unpacking the machine and assembling it great care should be used to avoid the least injury to any part; to clean scrupulously each and every part and to put them together in exactly the right way. Particular care must be taken to remove every particle of grit, dust, metal chips, waste, etc., from the shaft, bearing, magnetic joints and electrical connections. Study the blue prints and instructions sent out with the machine carefully. The armature must be handled with great care in order not to injure the wires and their insulation, as well as the commutator and shaft. The bearings should be carefully cleaned; set exactly in the right positions and secured, the tops being left a trifle loose for a short time, so that the tendency to heat up on the first run may be decreased, after which time they should be drawn up tight, but not sufficiently tight to bind. The adjustment of the brushes I would leave until the machine was electrically connected and ready to receive its trial run. If the machine was not in the operating room, and not too far away I would place the panel in the operating room. All motors should be and are supplied with a starting box for the following reason: If the line voltage should be applied directly to the terminal of the armature while it is standing still a very excessive current would flow, since the armature resistance is then very low—in fact, almost nothing; hence, to prevent injury to the windings, the starting box is used. Each motor and starting box must be protected with a cutout switch. Ammeter and voltmeter are on the panel and they are very useful to the operator, as they will give him a chance to keep the proper, or rather the best voltage at the arc, and by this means he can tell whether or not he is getting the right amperage. By having the panel in the operating room it will save lots of trouble after the machine is set up. It should be examined before starting, and again the machine should be thoroughly cleaned, especially its commutator and brushes, as any metal dust on the commutator or near it is likely to cause a short circuit. Also see that there are no bolts loose which may jar out. Be sure the bearings are properly oiled, and the brushes carefully examined and adjusted to make good contact with the commutator at the proper point; the switches connecting the machine to the circuit being left open. The machine should be revolved by hand and if everything looks good then it should be started and, if possible, brought up to capacity. I would watch the machine very carefully to see that nothing went wrong, and, in case it did, to be ready to pull the switch and stop it instantly, and then discover and correct the trouble before starting up again. As you say, the mere mechanical connections are simple enough, but the assembling should be carefully and intelligently done, even if there is only required the throwing of a clutch or a switch. I have tried to give you my reasons both in selecting a machine and installing one and this has been the biggest question you have asked so far. On with the good work and we will all learn something.

All of which is excellent, Fort Worth. Next time, however, you look at the question a little more carefully, and incorporate an answer to it in your reply.

The Correct Solution.

From North Dakota, comes the following with regard to the article on glass, page 1149, December 6th issue:

> The reason the glass only gets warm when held in the light at the aperture one-fourth of a minute is that the condensing lens absorbs the greater proportion of the heat waves which affect glass. If you were to hold a piece of mica at the aperture one-fourth minute it would get exceedingly hot, but place another piece of mica directly in front of the condensing lens and the piece at the aperture will not get nearly so hot. The piece of mica at the lens absorbs the greater part of the heat waves that effect mica. And now here is something that has been on my mind for quite a spell. A number of times I have read in the department of many good paying positions being open for really expert operators. I have your first edition of the Handbook and believe I was one of the first to get the second edition, so you see I am not passing up opportunities to study or learn. I make no claim of knowing it all. I realize I still have a lot to learn, but every manager I have worked for says I get the best picture he ever saw—but they are not willing to pay for it. I have been operating for eight years, but have been unable to squeeze more than $25.00 per week out of a manager yet. If I ask for more they say their expense account is as high as they care to go. I practically built the operating room of the ———— Theater, at ————, and worked there for six weeks at $25.00. I was then fired and the manager put his brother, a man who had scarcely seen a picture machine, in the operating room. Can you beat it? Was only out of a job one day. Have no trouble finding a position, but would like a chance at a really good one once. My present job pays $20.00, evenings, and no Sunday work, but that is the limit. Would like a chance with Lyman Howe, but cannot get a road card until I have been a member of the I. A. T. S. E. for two years. Now remember this is no grievance, but simply a statement of fact.

I am well aware of the fact that operators of real ability are likely to encounter the foregoing conditions. However, perhaps I have not made myself quite clear. If operators who are working in comparatively small towns receive $25.00 there, I believe that would be fully equal to $35.00 in New York City. This is not any idle statement, but a fact, and when I mentioned $40.00 I meant that to apply, particularly in the East, to the larger cities, such as New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, etc. It would be manifestly absurd to make a flat salary schedule for a man in New York of $40.00, and for the same class of man in Moulton, Iowa, a town of probably 5,000, or even in Springfield, Ill., a town of possibly 20,000. I do not think in my past statements I have put things exactly the way I intended them and I will issue a new statement, to wit: there is right now a position awaiting every really competent high class operator at a good salary, everything considered, which will reach as high as $35.00 to $40.00 in the larger cities. There, that is plain and what I have really meant. I know of operators here in New York who are receiving $35.00 and I know of one or two who are getting $40.00, whereas the great mass of operators in New York get an average of probably much nearer $20.00 than $25.00, so you see the high class ones are getting well paid for their superior performances. Suppose these same men got $25.00 in Bismarck, N. Dak. They would be just as well off, if not better, than they are now, even though they are getting $35.00 and $40.00 in New York City. Personally, I do not expect to see operators' salaries rise above $30.00 in the smaller cities, while conditions in general remain as they are, though in exceptional cases they may. Thirty dollars a week is $1,560 a year—not so bad where rents are reasonable, and you don't have to spend a dollar every time you turn around, as is the case in New York City. Thirty dollars a week in any small city is the equivalent of $45.00 or $50.00 a week in New York.

There, gentlemen, I presume you will accuse me of craw-fishing, though I am not, but only correcting my previous somewhat loosely worded statement. Incidentally, I might add, however, that $25.00 a week is almost equal to locomotive engineers' pay, when you deduct the extra expense he is put to by reason of the fact that he is only home about one-fourth of the time. You may say "yes, but the bricklayer gets $5.00 a day, and surely our work ought to be worth more than that of a bricklayer." Yes, you are right, but—remember, the bricklayer only works between six and eight months in the year, and loafs the balance of the time, whereas you work every day if you want to.

A New Stunt.

A. L. Criswell, Camden, N. J., contributes the following:

> As Jimmy (I suppose he means brother W. S. James—Ed.) is so taken up with condenser experiments that he has no time to think of anything else, I will submit the following, which we are using at our house, and which I consider excellent. We have a combination slide holder made large enough to fit into the front of the spotlight, and allowing a regular slide carrier to fit in the centre of it. From the side of the spotlight lamp house we attach a rod, extending some distance out in front to support the stereo lens. After focusing the slide on the walls of the theater, move the handle controlling the arc lamp backward or forward until the light rays cross at the objective lens. This allows us to throw a clock slide, or slides advertising coming attractions on any part of the walls of the house that are within range of the spotlight, and it certainly makes the people sit up and take notice. I hope that this small contraption will be of some use to the readers of the department.

That arrangement looks pretty good to me, brother Criswell, if it will work, but that is the rub. I presume it does work, but I do not see how it can the way you have described it. The attaching of the stereo lens is plain enough, but what about the condenser? Do you mean to say that you set the slide carrier right up against an ordinary spotlight lens, then project through an ordinary stereo lens? Maybe that will work, I cannot say, but I should not think so. However, no doubt our readers who have spotlight lamps will very quickly decide the matter.

Huh—Told You So.

On page 1277, under the heading, "For Discussion," brother Johnston made several remarks and assertions concerning pulsating current. I said at the time that I presumed brother Russell, of the General Electric Company, would rise up on his hind legs and smite friend Johnston on the wrist. He did so, or rather now does so, as follows:

> I have noted W. L. Johnston's letter, page 1277, December 13 issue. It is certainly interesting to read Mr. Johnston's views, although some of them are incorrect. In the first place I wish to emphasize the fact that the alternations of the slightly pulsating direct current from a rectifier are the same in number as the alternations in the a. c. from which it is derived, so that Mr. Johnston has evidently gotten the wrong impression as to the pulsating current being 1500, 3600, and 7980 periods per minute for 25, 60 and 133 cycles, respectively. I assume he means per minute and not per second.
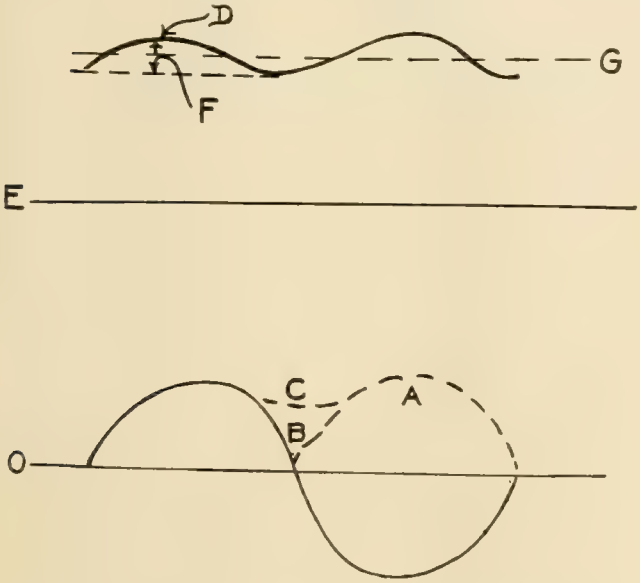
> Let us go to some extent into the theory of the rectifier. All the rectifier does is to take the bottom or negative wave of a. c. and turn it above the line, and, on account of the reactance in the rectifier, smooth out the wave, so that the pulsations are equal to not more than 25 per cent. of the maximum point on the wave. To better illustrate this I am sending you a sketch.



The heavy lines of the lower figure show the action of the a. c. supply. The rectifier first turns over the lower wave, making its action as per dotted line, A. By means of its reactance the rectifier fills in the valley, B, as per dotted line C, so that the resulting wave is something like wave D (upper figure), in which line G represents zero and the distance F represents about 25 per cent. of the distance between D and E. (I don't exactly understand what you mean by that brother Russell, but I have given your drawing just as you made it. If you mean that fluctuations in voltage of the wave, as shown, equal about 25 per cent. of the distance from dotted line G to line E then what does that particular distance represent? I do not quite see the point there. In fact I don't quite understand what that E line is for anyway. Suppose you clear that particular point up a little.—Ed.). From this it will readily be seen that there is no time during the operation of the rectifier when the arc is out, or, in other words, without voltage. There is a time, however, when the arc is dim one-half of F, or 12½ per cent., but at other times it is increased 12½ per cent. when the wave is at its highest point. Therefore the average current read is represented approximately by dotted line G. Based on this explanation, therefore, it makes very little difference in the actual light obtained whether the rectifier is running on 25 or 133 cycles, or anywhere between that number.

Theoretically, it makes no difference whether a two or three-wing shutter be used, so far as source of current be concerned. Whether or not a direct current generator produces direct current depends entirely upon the generator. With the ordinary generator the pulsations are not enough to be noticeable, although if the wave form were measured, it would show very slight pulsations. Even though the rectifier might go to zero at each point, as B in Figure 1, the pulsations, even on 25 cycles, are so fast that it is almost impossible to get the shutter in synchronism with them. (Don't agree with you there, brother Russell.—Ed.). The very fact that there are about two thousand rectifiers operating moving picture machines on frequencies between 25 and 133 and that no complaint has ever been received regarding the pulsations getting into synchronism, would indicate that the above outlined theory is absolutely correct. I have noticed, from time to time, a number of suggestions regarding the use of storage batteries in connection with moving picture machines. Now, while the storage battery gives a certain sense of reliability it is not an efficient way of operating a projector, for the reason that it is absolutely necessary to install a liberal amount of resistance in order to get suitable regulation at the arc. With a mercury arc rectifier, or motor generator set, this regulation is inherent in the apparatus, but there is no way in which a storage battery can be differentially wound or used with reactance or other devices calculated to give the drop in voltage, which is so necessary for proper regulation of a projector arc lamp. I am always pleased to see questions of this kind brought up in the department, because I feel that moving picture operators are directly interested in these subjects and will give a little time to their study. If at any time I can be of any assistance in clearing up points, not only in connection with the rectifier, but in connection with any other electrical devices, I shall be glad to do so. By-the-way, I notice on page 1278, December 13 issue, that W. H. Russell asks whether or not a mercury arc rectifier bulb can be used in conjunction with a compensarc. Will you please advise Mr. Russell that a rectifier tube cannot be used on a compensarc, for the reason that there is no appreciable reactance in the compensarc to bridge over the valley between the peaks of the waves, as shown in the figure.

This department is very much indebted to brother Russell for his explanation of these matters. I must take issue, however, to the statement that a three-wing shutter cannot get into synchronism with the alternations if the machine is speeded up just a little. The shutter blades cut the light at the rate of about 50 a second when running at normal speed, and you will observe that it would not take much of an increase in speed to put the shutter into synchronism with one side of the alternations of 60 cycle current, or conversely with pulsations emanating from 60 cycle current. What you say is true, but, instead of proving that the shutter cannot get into synchronism, it simply means, I think, that its getting into synchronism with the pulsations has no effect, or, in other words, does no harm.

Child Operators.

F. B. Payne, Adrian, Mich., writes recommending the books of a certain concern in Chicago, and then continues:

> Nothing new around here except the same old story of child operators. A lecturer recently told me of a house in northern Michigan which was paying its "operator" the magnificent sum of 15 cents per show. I cannot vouch for the truth of this, but believe it, as some of the stunts pulled off around here are simply awful. That 15 cent operator must have owed himself considerable money at the end of the week. I put on a shutter of my own design recently and it gives fine results with 110 volts a. c. The blades are exactly of a size, two of them measuring 2¼ inches at the outer edge, or periphery of the shutter. I made my model of pasteboard; in fact the model is still on the machine. I have a Standard, Model 4, plaster screen, and Universal six-day program—a good enough combination for any operator to get results with. I have some interesting photographs I am going to send you soon. Brush-lot Burlesque is still used in Adrian, though not in this house. Clean pictures, when accompanied by the proper ingredients, get the business. We had our little fling at 5-cent vaudeville, and once was enough. There is no union here, but I wish we were big enough to do things. I have seen some of the concentrated filament lamps at work and would venture to say if they could only be applied to projection it would be a big step in advance. Am sending you, under separate cover, an operator-composed song. A local singer put this on and you bet we packed 'em. It is going fine. It appears that some of the boys have a little talent outside of the operating room. Our local music dealer has a big window full of them.

I am awaiting that song in fear and trembling, brother Payne, and I sincerely hope it will not give me a pain, as does some of the "poetry" showered upon my defenceless head. However, from what you say it must be quite a success, so I will have more to say about it after I have heard it. That kid operator business has been treated so often and the opinion of this department has been so frequently expressed that it would be useless to reiterate it. You are correct in saying that clean pictures mixed with proper ingredients bring the money, the "ingredients" consisting of the various things which go to make up high class projection.

Same Old Blunder.

Mitchell, S. Dak., writes ordering a Handbook and then asks:

> What is the proper focal length of condenser for a 75-foot throw? Am using a Simplex machine and find that on some scenes in a film it is impossible to get a clear picture, while on others, on the same reel, the focus is sharp and clear. What size and kind of carbon would you use with a Wagner converter?

You have made the mistake of so many others in asking a question and only giving half the necessary information. The focal length of the condenser depends upon the focal length of the objective, therefore I must know not only the length of the throw, but the width of the picture in order to answer. I think, however, a study of the Handbook will fix you up on both questions. As to the trouble with the focus, I have had reels of pictures on which it was necessary to adjust my lens for almost every scene thereof. I have had a good many explanations of the why and wherefore of this, but none of them seem to exactly fill the bill. The trouble lies in the taking of the negative by different cameras. You must understand that while a film consists of half a dozen scenes, there may possibly have been a half dozen cameras used in its making. Now it would seem that if one scene was sharp and the next was not sharp, then there would be no way or method of improving upon the sharpness of the fuzzy one. But this is not always the fact, and that is the thing which has always puzzled yours truly, because I have jumped from a perfectly projected scene to an out-of-focus one, and then have very much improved the latter by re-focusing. I guess all other operators have had the same experience. Can anybody offer an explanation that spells common sense? The only thing I know of would be a difference in the thickness of the celluloid, but celluloid runs so uniform nowadays that any difference would be so very slight that it doesn't seem that it could possibly have a perceptible effect on a picture. I do not think at the present time the difference could be more than one one-thousandth of an inch. The fault does not lie in the machine. If the machine projects one scene perfectly, then it should project them all perfectly. As to carbon sizes: that is not a matter of the converter but of amperage. ⅝ core are large enough up to 60 amperes a. c.

The Glass Matter.

John Griffiths, Ansonia, Conn., writes:

> Anything in the nature of a conundrum appeals to me, therefore this letter concerning the glass puzzle did so. Using an ordinary cover glass, I held it in the full strength of the light at the aperture for thirty turns of the crank, or one-half minute. Result, small rise in temperature. After the glass had become cold again, I put it in the slide carrier, where it became very much hotter in the same length of time. Again, when the glass had cooled off I put it in the top of the lamp house, resting on one edge, and the glass was—well it was too hot to hold for any length of time. From this I assume that the passage of a hot light has a very moderate heating effect on glass, as compared with the heat imparted by direct contact with hot metal. If this is true we may assume that the reason why condensers break less often when the condenser casing is lined with asbestos is because the metal cannot conduct the heat to the condensers so readily. Personally, I have broken but one lens in a year, and that one broke the first show following the cleaning out of my Standard No. 4 lamp house. I examined the condenser casing afterwards and found some coarse particles of carbon on which the condenser had been resting, and it was from this point that the lens cracked. In view of the experiments with a cover glass is it not reasonable to assume that the particles of carbon form a point of conductivity from the hot lamp house to the glass? Not that the heat matters so much, but that it is a source of unequal heating and cooling. In the same manner any irregular point in the condenser casing, such as a small dent, which may cause the condenser to touch only on one small point might cause breakage.

Brother Griffiths also appends a sketch and description of a film mender he has made. However, while I can see that the mender would work all right I doubt if very many operators could be induced to use one. Still, if the brother sends a good drawing, or a sample of the device, I will see whether it is advisable to publish it or not. As to the glass matter, undoubtedly glass will absorb heat very rapidly through direct contact with hot metal. The main reason the glass became hotter when near the condenser than it does at the aperture is that it was right up against an exceedingly hot piece of glass and received much of the extra heat on that account. The correct answer to that particular proposition, or what I think is the right answer, has already been given. However, there is, I believe, a great deal in what friend Griffiths says in regard to the uneven contact of the condenser with the hot lamp-house walls. This would, I think, have considerable to do with breakage, and is the principal reason, as Mr. Griffiths suggests, why separating the lens from the metal with asbestos helps to reduce breakage.

Measuring Condensers.

Professor E. J. Wall, of Syracuse University, Syracuse, N. Y., recently wrote a letter to the department, a portion of which dealt with various things relating to condenser lenses. In my comments I said, among other things, that a certain formula set forth by Mr. Wall for measuring the plano-convex lens would be Greek to the average reader. A carbon copy of this matter was sent to the professor, who now writes:

> I must protest against the statement that the use of manganese salt as a so-called decolorizer is a deliberate swindle on the part of the lens manufacturers. The fault lies primarily with the users of these lenses, who have probably demanded whiter glass at a cheap price. This demand has been passed on to the glass smelter and has been met by the addition of manganese. Now whether the smelter-man knew or knows that the addition of manganese would later cause the lens to turn purple is merely a matter of reading, as this fact has been known since 1890, at least, although I believe that Sir William Crookes was the first to point out in 1905 that the coloration was due to the ultra-violet rays. I certainly never intended to impute deliberate swindling to anyone; at the worst an error of judgment or ignorance of a scientific fact was all which could be charged. Also let me correct the statement as to copper sulphide. I did not state that this would decompose; as a matter of fact I do not know that it would, because native copper sulphide is extremely intractable. If it were not so difficult to reduce, probably copper would be cheaper. But sodium sulphide will readily decompose, and this was what I stated. Fifteen grains in a quart of water will effectually perfume my class room, which measures 40 x 20 x 12 feet, in something like five minutes. I might add that a green condenser ought theoretically to be better than a whiter one containing manganese, because the pronounced green tinge, especially as it is due to the presence of iron silicates, would not only cut out some of the heat rays, but also make the light whiter by absorbing some of the preponderating red and orange rays of the arc.
> Probably if I put the formula for measuring the focus of a condenser into non-technical language it might be useful. Remove the condenser from its cell; present the flat side of the lens which is next to the arc to the sun and obtain as sharp an image as possible, measure the distance from the center of the curved surface to the image, and call this F1. Next present the curved surface of the other lens to the sun and obtain as sharp an image as possible and measure the distance from the flat surface to the image. Measure the thickness of this last lens and add two-thirds to the last figure obtained, and call the result F2. Whereupon we have the formula F1 multiplied by F2, divided by F1 plus F2, minus the separation of the lens, is the equivalent focus. Taking the example given on page 356 of the Handbook, and assuming that the thickness of the lens is 1½ inches and the distance between them ½ inch, we have:
> F1=6 plus 1=7
> F2=7 minus 1=6 and
> 7x6=42, which divided by
> 7 plus 6 = 13 minus ½ inch = 13 = 3¼ inches, which is the equivalent focus of the condenser, and not 6½, as stated in Handbook. The whole question of condensers, not only from the theoretical, but the constructional point of view, has been neglected, and as proof of this I might point to pages 354 and 355 of the Handbook, where Figure 144, which is put forth as the probable path of the rays, deals with cones of light, which are free from aberrations of all kinds—a condition we know to be impossible except in text books, written by professors of optics, for whom I have the gravest respect and admiration, not being one of that distinguished body myself, and further that particular figure has nothing to do with projection.

With regard to the discoloration of lenses I am not asking the professor to charge the lens manufacturers with being dishonest; I will attend to that item myself. I repeat that, if these manufacturers have complied with a demand for whiter glass by incorporating an ingredient which they knew would later discolor and ruin the lens, then it was a swindle. On the other hand, if they add this injurious ingredient without knowledge of its injurious effect they are equally culpable, because, being lens manufacturers they are supposed to know these things, provided, of course, the knowledge is available, as the professor says it is, and has been for a long time.

The Handbook measurement cited is not the equivalent focus at all. As far as I know the operator has no use at present for the equivalent focus of the condensing lens. What he wants to know is the back focus of the single lens, and that is what the Handbook gives according to the best rule obtainable at that time. I notice in the professor's formula for obtaining the e. f. of the condenser, the separation of the lenses cuts a considerable figure. It is the first time I have ever seen this factor recognized in a practical way. The separation of the lenses does make a difference, as has been set forth in the department many times, but I was not aware that anyone knew exactly what the optical effect of that difference was, or of how to apply it in figuring the combination. As to Fig. 144 it is only designed to show the approximate path of the light ray through the lens, and is not, so far as I know, of any further importance.

I am very glad indeed this argument has come up, for it is discussions of this kind which set men to studying, and bring out the real facts. Things have been mentioned which are of much importance, and which not one operator in a hundred ever heard of before. Perhaps we have not gained much from this particular matter—yet; but we will, however, for it will set hundreds if not thousands of men to thinking, and out of that will come increased knowledge. We again thank Professor Wall for his contribution to the slowly accumulating fund of knowledge on projection.

A Brand New Scheme.

Winnipeg, Canada, contributes a new scheme for measuring the focal length of condensing lenses as follows:

> It is usually impossible to measure condensing lenses accurately in an operating room, owing to the closeness of the object (ordinarily an incandescent lamp) focused, but if the operator has a pair of callipers and a rule handy, he can determine the focal length of the lenses by measuring the thickness thereof according to the following scale, the measurement to be taken at the thickest point, of course.
> 1 inch thick=6 inch focal length.
> 9/10 inch thick = 6½ inch focal length.
> ¾ inch thick = 7½ inch focal length.
> 13/20 inch thick = 8¼ inch focal length.
> 1/2 inch thick = 9½ inch focal length.
> I won't say these figures are exact, but they are near enough for practical purposes. In the Department, November 22 issue, you have an illustration of a double pole, double throw switch with two sets of fuses. This scheme is all right, but throwing that switch over would reverse the polarity, if the current be direct. If J. A. Wetter, of Stanton, Iowa, will examine the gear on the end of the revolving shutter shaft of his Power's Six A he may find that his trouble lies in the fact that this gear is not back far enough to allow the worm gear to mesh properly with its driving gear.

As to the lens matter I do not believe the scheme presented would work, for the very simple reason that some lenses contain a surplus of glass. By this I mean that some lenses have a thick edge and some have a thin edge. Now, the thin edge lens would be thinner for a given focal length than the thick edge lens by exactly the thickness of the edge, or at least that is the way it looks to me, assuming, of course, that both lenses are of equal diameter. Except for this reason, Winnipeg, the scheme would work all right. As to the criticism on the double throw switch, I am obliged to remove my chapeau to Winnipeg; the blunder is mine, but I assure you it was merely a blunder in drawing. I did not think of the polarity-reversing matter at the time. Apologies, gentlemen, mistakes will occur in the best regulated families.

Continuous Operation.

B. W. Davidson, the Grand Theater, Wellsville, Ohio, writes:

> Could two machines be operated with one Fort Wayne compensarc? That is to say, what would be the effect of operating the compensarc practically continuously for three or four hours? Do you know of any firm making counter-shafting for belting up two machines to be operated by one motor by throwing in clutches?

There would be, or should be, no injurious effect whatever through the continuous operation of the compensarc. A transformer which won't operate continuously is not a good transformer. In fact it is what the lisping small boy would call a "thun-of-a-gun." As to the counter shafting matter, there is, or was, some firm which made such an arrangement and it was described in the department quite a while ago. I do not remember who they were now, but believe if they would advertise they would find a considerable demand for such a shafting and clutch. By-the-way, write to the theater named on page 368 of the Handbook concerning the clutch and shafting shown in Figure 149 and I guess you will eventually get what you are looking for.

Light Trouble.

Calgary, Alberta, Canada, has troubles on his mind as follows:

> I use d. c. from a generator manufactured by the General Electric Company. It is an 11 k.w. machine. The trouble is, the carbons flame too much and, as near as I can make out, the negative flames a great deal more than the positive. When I project the light to the screen without any film in the machine I can see it flash and gleam instead of being steady, and I believe it is the flame that does it. I cut the current down as low as 30 amperes and the flame was still there. I tried different kinds of carbons, with the same result—a flashing effect on the picture. Another thing: the d. c. won't work with a solid carbon, no matter how high or how low the amperage. The tip of the positive carbon does not seem to get heated up enough. I can see a little red spot on the carbon and this keeps traveling around the top of the carbon. You cannot tell where it will land the next minute and the light is not steady; for that reason we can use only cored carbons on d. c. I know this is something that should not be, but I cannot locate the trouble. I have two Power's rheostats for each lamp house because I cannot get more than 45 amperes with one.

In the first place I would not advise you to use more than 45 amperes d. c., though you could, of course, do so by using a ¾ carbon up to 60 amperes. I do not think there is any use of the ⅞ carbon which you mentioned in your last letter. In the second place you surely understand that with direct current the positive wire must be attached to the upper binding post of the lamp and the negative to the lower. I wonder if you have your lamp connected wrong side up. Suppose you try switching the wires and see what happens. Also you must use a cored upper carbon with d. c., though you may, and I think it is better, use a solid carbon below. From what you say I am inclined to think that for some reason or other you are not only not exceeding 45 amperes of current, but are in fact getting a whole lot less. The whole thing, the way you put it, is most decidedly a puzzle. Try transposing the wires of your lamp first. See pages 197 to 212 of the Handbook.

The Heating of Glass.

Mr. Adam Foltz, Findlay, Ohio, writes:

> I notice in December 6th issue, you tell us to hold a clear piece of glass over the machine aperture plate in the full strength of the light for one-quarter of a minute; then remove it and tell why it is no hotter than it is. In the first place fifteen seconds does not give the glass any time to get warm. I placed a piece of glass over my machine aperture and within a minute or so the glass broke all to pieces. The party who put that little stunt in says, "you wise ones, get this one." If he is so wise, let him get mine. Cut a thin piece of tissue paper, such as is used in toilet rooms, large enough to cover the aperture plate, or the width of a piece of film and about three inches long, place it over the aperture, and close the gate to hold it in place. Now light the arc and throw the light on the paper for five minutes and tell us why the paper does not only not burn, but doesn't even get hot.

Well, neighbor Foltz, I may not be very wise, but I think if you are using anything like a heavy amperage and hold your finger in the light at the aperture for fifteen seconds, you will put in the next fifteen minutes hunting up a doctor, and the next fifteen days in getting that particular finger well. This being the case, I must dispute you when you say there is not sufficient heat at the aperture to heat a piece of glass in fifteen seconds, provided, of course, you are using a normal d. c. amperage. You will find one or two other letters on this subject either this week or next which may interest you. As to the paper matter, if it is a fact, it is a very queer one. I pass it along, therefore, to operators for experiment.

Aber Nit.

Minnesota makes a strenuous endeavor to slap the editor on the wrist as follows:

> Referring to "A Poser," page 1149, December 6 issue, if Columbus will get two aperture plates exactly alike, or file them so they will be exactly alike, he should have no trouble in getting the same size picture with both machines, even though his two 5-inch lenses are not matched, by moving the machine, giving the larger picture ahead and the one giving the small back. Very simple, isn't it?

Can't say that it is, Minnesota. At least the simplicity is not apparent to the naked eye. In the first place if you do much filing on the side of an aperture plate you might have a nice little row of sprocket holes on the side of the screen. In the second place you would not have room enough in the average operating room to move the machines far enough ahead or back to eliminate this kind of trouble. However, you had better look that "A Poser" proposition over again. I think you will find that you have overlooked the real puzzle part of the whole business.

Playing Safe.

E. L. Shwetzer, Chairman of Ball Committee, Local 252, Sacramento, Cal., writes:

> After reading of the carelessness of Operators' Local 543, Paterson, N. J., in not providing you with a suffragette after inviting you to their last ball, it is my pleasure to inform you that Stage Employees' Local No. 50, Musicians' Local No. 12, and M. P. O. Local No. 252, are to give an entertainment and grand ball, Wednesday, February 18, to which you are extended a cordial invitation, with the assurance that you won't be at all lonesome during your stay. Yes, we've got 'em, and lots of 'em, too, and the pesky critters are all purty, by heck. You can have your pick from seventeen to seventy, therefore don't forget the date.

No, I won't forget the date, brother Shwetzer—also I won't forget the three thousand miles between. That is what I call a mean trick—making a great, big bluff, well knowing that I cannot call you.

The Distress Signal.

F. W. McDaniel, Swift Currnet, Saskatchewan, Canada, writes:

> Have a Power's Six which has been in use about six months. I noticed the crank shaft seemed to be bent. Upon examination found that it had not been wearing evenly in the bearings, so decided that it had been bent before leaving the factory. I therefore ordered a new one and replaced the old with the new, whereupon I supposed my troubles were ended, but nay, nay Pauline. After running a month or so, the new one was worse than the old. Meanwhile we had installed a new Six A and, of course, I never dreamed of having the same trouble with it, but it was even so. Our equipment here consists of an 11 h.p. Foss gas engine, a 7 kw. generator, and two Power's machines, projecting 99 feet to plaster, using a 6½ Gundlach lens.
> Now here is another one. Why is it that a 6½ Gundlach lens projects a six-inch smaller picture at that distance than a 6½ Bausch & Lomb lens? We have the best equipped theater in this neck of the woods. Seats 350; prices are 10 and 15 cents. Use features every day, thirty-day stuff. Two operators; run continuously from 2:30 to 10:30 in a town of 6,000 population, and there are two other picture houses here also. The town has a reputation for good projection. Have one of your Handbooks and have ordered another as a present for a friend. Outside of a little fire-shutter and toggle gear trouble my machines run perfectly. I wish to approve of the questions now running in the department. They are just what I have needed.

I really see no reason for your crankshaft trouble. Don't imagine for a moment those crankshafts are not made true at the factory. If they were out even so much as one one-thousandth of an inch they would be rejected. It is, of course, always possible that an assembler might accidentally bend one (not an easy thing to do) and take a chance on its getting by the inspector, which it might also do, though it is not at all likely; but to think you would get two such machines does not seem within the range of human probability, so I really don't know what to think about it. However, if the crankshaft is bent, take it out of the machine and have it straightened at some machine shop, or straighten it yourself by lying it on a perfectly flat surface and using a hammer judiciously. I always like to hear from towns where projection is good, and that 10 and 15 cent admission sounds better to me than 5 and 10. As to the Gundlach and Bausch & Lomb lenses throwing a different size picture; then they are not both 6½ lenses, even though they are supposed to be. You must remember, my dear sir, that projection lenses are cheap lenses and therefore their accuracy cannot always be depended upon. Moreover, it is possible that one or more of the combinations of one of the lenses are not screwed into place, which might also account for the difference, since the further apart the two combinations are the smaller the picture will be, and it would not take very much to make a difference of six inches on that throw either. Very often two stock lenses, both marked the same e. f., say 6½, will show a variation of two or three inches on the same throw. Six inches is, however, extreme.

How Slides Are Made.

Birmingham, Ala., writes:

> Please advise if ordinary stereopticon slides, such as are furnished by song slide manufacturers, are photographed and then hand colored, or, better still, tell me how they are made. Can one exposure be made and several copies printed therefrom, or does each slide represent a separate exposure? Of course, I know how they are made, but I know just enough to know that I do not know. (Some class to that statement, all right.—Ed.). Will appreciate a full explanation; also what kind of camera should I get, as I want to make slides of some local views.

Stereopticon slides are simply positive photographs on glass, and each one is hand colored by using aniline colors. If I remember rightly these colors are aniline dyes, such as diamond or other dyes of that sort. The modus operandi is as follows: You can use any sort of camera you wish, but perhaps a four by five is best. Then you make your exposures and develop in the usual way. Then, having procured some glass positives slide size (any dealer in photographic supplies can get them for you), you can either print by contact or by means of a printer. Contact work is seldom good. You should have a printing machine which is in reality nothing more or less than an enlarging or reducing camera. You can now print as many positives as you wish to from the one negative, and color the positives or not, as you desire. But you will spoil quite a bunch of material before you succeed. If any of our readers can give more explicit directions, let them stand forth and be heard. I do not pretend to know a whole lot about slide making, though I am a pretty good amateur photographer when it comes to making plain photographs. If you print by contact you will use an ordinary printing frame, using a glass positive instead of paper, and if the positive is smaller than the negative, lay the positive over that part of the negative which you like best. If you print with a printer you may mask off the negative and use what you wish or use the whole thing, reducing it to slide size.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

"A CHRISTMAS STORY" (Vitagraph), December 22.—We reviewed this pleasing offering on page 1418, issue of December 20, 1913.

"THROUGH FLAMING PATHS" (Lubin), December 22.—A picture for the gallery with scenes that will please those in that part of the house. A more unconvincing melodrama would be hard to make. That scene where they are carrying women like so many sacks from the smoke of burning woods looks anything but plausable. Emmett Campbell Hall is the author and Joe Smiley produced it.

"TEACHING HIS WIFE A LESSON" (Edison), December 22.—The judge, himself, couldn't tell 'em apart when their backs were turned and he turned the prisoner loose. The man was in trouble because he didn't like to see his wife carry her bag so carelessly and to teach her a lesson, stole a bag just like hers from a woman with a suit and hat exactly like his wife's. The men will sympathize with him and the women ought to get a good lesson. But, we may note in passing, that the wife in the picture wasn't taking any advice. Robert Wells Ritchie is the author and the producer is Charles Seay. The offering is above fair and seemed to please the audience a good deal.

"PRODUCTS OF THE WEST INDIES" (Edison), December 22.—Bananas and cocoanuts are the theme of this clearly photographed short offering on the same reel. The wages of the laborers are given, but the amounts don't mean anything. Work is apparently not a necessity with the natives down there; living is too cheap.

"GILT-EDGED STOCKS" (Kalem), December 22.—A picture with no center of interest, or to be more correct, a shifting one. At first we are watching to see whether a certain sharper will be apprehended or not. He is a swindler and the police are shadowing his office with a dictaphone. They don't learn much until near the close, when a new story begins, and they wake up in time to catch the wrong end of a conversation and accuse the wrong man of murder, but the girl who shot in self defense, confesses and the victim also makes a confession before he dies.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 78."—There are some automobile thrills in this number that excite the spectators. The rest of the items are not of any special interest.

"BETWEEN DANCES" (Lubin), Dec 23.—The boldness of the young man in taking the advice of his elderly friend—i.e., that women like to be mastered—will hardly serve as a safe example for others to follow. One might meet up with a young woman who is pretty strong on the mastering stuff herself. However, the picture is well put on and will interest.

"A COLLEGE CUPID" (Lubin), Dec. 23.—There is a new kind of a chase in this short comedy, which will make some fun.

"HER FAITH IN THE FLAG" (Vitagraph), Dec. 23.—Pigott and Schwarz are the authors of this single-reel drama, which contains more of real drama and pathos than most of the multiple-reel subjects we have seen lately. Robert Thornby directs, and to him also credit is due. Dolores Brown, as an Italian immigrant, does good work in a story of a peasant woman's faith in the flag of her adopted country. The plot at first seems too simple, but before the picture is half down you realize that you are gripped; and you are held right to the last.

"A VAGABOND CUPID" (Essanay), Dec. 23.—A good story and a pretty finish. Richard Travers and Irene Warfield have the leads. Eleanor Kahn has the part of Little Tim, a waif, and aside from the fact that a girl in boy's clothing invariably spoils the illusion—for which of course she was not responsible—she was most interesting.

"THE UPWARD WAY" (Edison), Dec. 23.—This picture is well put on and will interest. It is beyond human belief, however, that a man would insist on the arrest of another for the theft of a loaf of bread taken to save the life of a starving mother and that he should be taken to jail from the side of the dead body and then sent to prison. In so far the picture is improbable. There is a large cast and a good one.

"MOTHER LOVE VS. GOLD" (Selig), Dec. 23.—William Duncan produces and plays the lead in this picture, which is a Western, and it will interest. Myrtle Stedman has the role of a widow. There are moments of suspense when the miner goes for the doctor to attend the child of the widow. By the way, it is possible some of the women who see the picture will be inclined to think the widow who remained single but a month was hurrying matters, but why should not the widow have been the best judge as to that?

"A DIP IN THE BRINY" (Selig), December 23.—The origin of the joke which forms the basis of these thousand feet of film may be traced by archaeologists to the period before the great flood. Two old men go in bathing and their clothes are stolen in jest by three young women who have been carrying on a flirtation with the sons of the old men. The selection of the outdoor scenes in which this story is laid is about the only merit in the film and makes it more acceptable than it would be otherwise.

"THE HONORABLE ALGERNON" (Vitagraph), December 23.—This is a very creditable attempt at refined comedy and is sure to please. The types as in most Vitagraph productions are selected with rare judgment and the acting is good from beginning to end. Some of the situations are contrived with great cleverness and is finish is most amusing.

"TWO UP A TREE" (Pathe), December 23. The use of an insane asylum and of insane persons to build a comedy with is rarely successful as a laugh-getter. This film is no exception to the rule. The situations are shockingly improbable and what little humor there is seems spread over too large a surface.

"AT THE OLD MAID'S CALL" (Essanay), December 23.—Whatever notion of fun and humor may have existed in the director's mind when he made this film died utterly on its way to the screen. It is inane and "draggy" and the situations are forced.

"GLIMPSES OF RIO DE JANEIRO" (Essanay), December 23.—This short scenic picture shows interesting parts of the great Brazilian city and gives one a good idea of the life in the chief city of our sister republic to the South.

"MARY'S NEW HAT" (Edison), December 24.—A bright little farce well acted and freshly amusing. Its author is S. W. Bunting and it was produced by Charles H. France. Elsie MacLeod plays a young matron who wants a new hat she has seen and Edward Boulden, her husband who won't come across. Her father takes the young husband's part; but she is too clever for them and their scheme to fool her justifies her by which she gets the big feather and it is all quite acceptable.

"THE JANITOR'S QUIET LIFE" (Edison), December 24.—Sharing the reel with the foregoing, this picture was especially designed for boys, but will amuse grown-ups. It is very slight. Dan Mason, who plays the janitor, is exactly the same as in his former role in "The Thrifty Janitor." The sketch is by Charles M. Seay and he also produced it.

"THE SPIRIT OF CHRISTMAS" (Vitagraph), December 25.—A well named offering. It is filled with Christmas spirit, is emotionally satisfying and wholesome, especially in the new and beautiful way in which at its close the heroine's contrition wins forgiveness for her weakness in keeping the dropped bill and then lying about it. Anyway, the audience fairly ate the picture up. The comments heard around this tough old reviewer almost made him weep. Its theme is Christmas among poor and rich in the city and it has some delightful snow scenes and some fine Christmas tree scenes. The acting is sweet and natural. William Humphrey, in his role of bored man of wealth, gave a convincing touch to the story's natural contrasts by his unconventional acting, which to the people around me seemed at first burlesque—it is good character drawing. The author, Elaine Sterne, deserves credit, as do the producers, William Humphrey and Tefft Johnson and all concerned.

"DOC YAK'S CHRISTMAS" (Selig), December 25.—Good holiday stuff, clever, Christmasy and with some good drawing (pen and ink). It is better than most of Sidney Smith's Doc Yak offerings.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 79," December 25.—Not seen by our reviewer.

"RUINS OF ANGKOR-THOM" (Melies), December 25.—Views of a magnificent ruin, one of the wonders of Asia and one of the most marvelous buildings in the world. For a long review of this remarkably interesting offering see page 1552 of the December 27, 1913, issue of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

"THE GOLF GAME AND THE BONNET" (Vitagraph), December 26.—Another of the inimitable Bunny series, with John himself and Flora Finch as the married couple. Bunny's antics on the golf field were laughable; also the manner in which he convinced his wife that she gave him the black eye. Willie Van assists very capably. A full reel comedy of the better type.

"THE DEATH TRAP" (Lubin), December 26.—Good photography and splendid scenic effects combine to hold the interest in this story, which gets a very natural and convincing start. The detective and counterfeiter looked so much alike as to be confusing in one or two places and the situations at the close were a little weak. As a whole, however, the production will render a good account of itself with the average audience.

"EMANCIPATED WOMEN" (Kalem), December 26.—In its entertaining plot and clever handling throughout, this rises above the ordinary half-reel comedy in interest. John E. Brennan and his associates have a lot of fun in this triple romance. A merry little satire on the prevailing woman's rights question, with nothing of an offensive nature.

"TALCUM POWDER" (Kalem), December 26.—Showing how the soft rock from which this product is made is taken from the mines; also something of the manner of treatment afterward. The manufacture of the familiar toilet article proves very instructive. This, with above, makes a good split reel.

"HIS SISTER" (Selig), December 26.—This film story, written by W. E. Wing, has a rather slow development and numerous scenes seem unnecessary, but it gets under the surface of things and presents an interesting phase of life. It shows the way in which a pampered girl imposes upon her good-hearted brother, until he finally rebels and the other man comes to his aid. The close is a happy one and the film holds the interest.

"CORFU, AN ISLE OF THE IONIAN SEA" (Patheplay), December 27.—This, on same reel with above, is picturesque and pleasing throughout.

"THE DOCTOR'S ROMANCE" (Lubin), December 27.—A very pretty love story, in which the widow's small son brings things to a crisis by calling the doctor up by telephone and telling him his mother is crying over the doctor's picture. Brooks McCloskey made a very appealing juvenile. Harry C. Myers and Ethel Clayton play the leads. The story develops naturally and is very enjoyable.

"A SNAKEVILLE COURTSHIP" (Essanay), December 27.—Another good-humored ranch comedy, in which Margaret Joslin, as Sophie, alarms the cowboys considerably in her search for a lover. Later, after she holds up the bandits and wins a large reward, they are all ready to marry her. This is a genuinely amusing number.

"THE CLUB CURE" (Biograph), December 27.—This half-reel comedy gets up quite a little amusement. The young wife waiting for hubby to return from the club gets a neighbor to tie her to a chair, making a pretence of burglary. More complications arise than she expected.

"THE SUICIDE PACT" (Biograph), December 27.—In spite of its grim title, this, on same reel with above, proves quite funny. The lovers push two dummies over a cliff, frightening father so he relents and allows them to marry. The reel as a whole is pleasing and gets a number of laughs.

"HER INDIAN BROTHER" (Kalem), December 27.—This Indian story concerns a young redskin and his sister who go to an Indian school, leaving their respective sweethearts behind. The young engineer follows Ventra, teaches her to love him and then deserts her. The story has a tragic close and is altogether one of about ordinary interest.

"A PROPOSAL FROM MARY" (Edison), December 27.—This is the sixth and last of the "Who Will Marry Mary?" series. It is as romantic and generally pleasing as any observer could desire. He comes in an airship, this fortunate fellow, and Mary herself does the proposing. The pictures, both exterior and interior, are satisfying. In justice to the little mystery we do not mention whom Mary chose, but we think those familiar with the series can guess.

"THE OPEN DOOR" (Selig), December 22.—Taking pictures as they come we have found that human quality in the story will cover a multitude of sins. Here is a case where an offering gets by as good entertainment on its unpretentious likeableness so that, although it doesn't convince strongly and is not dramatic, still it's a good offering, comforting and acceptable. There is little doubt that it would have been even better in one reel instead of two. Wallace C. Clifton is the author and it was produced by N. MacGregor.

"AT CROSS PURPOSES" (Cines), Dec. 23.—Here are two reels containing many fine comedy touches in a domestic drama. It is a story of husband and wife who drift apart or nearly drift apart because, while the man desires to remain at home evenings, the woman craves society life. Much of the interest in the production will attach to the interpretation of the wife, which is given by a woman who has brains as well as being of striking beauty. Household matters seem to travel a rough road for the husband while he remains recalcitrant, but as soon as he shows a disposition to go out he finds he has a wife that is worth while.

"THE PARASITE" (Lubin), December 25.—A large and fairly representative audience was favorably impressed by this three-part offering. It is one of those "heart of a lady crook" pictures and has been extremely well put on. Its sets are mostly interiors, rooms of wealthy people; they are large, perfectly appointed though lavishly. The acting (Arthur Johnson's company plays it) makes a strong appeal and is very meritorious. Then the photography is clear. The story is its weakest point; but even that as played, interests. Lottie Briscoe, in the titular role, not only puts the appeal of her sex in the picture by her acting; but appears in a bewildering number of splendid new dresses and some of them most becoming. Howard Mitchell, as the lady crook's nifty husband, is the most unfortunately chosen player in the cast. He acts well, but seldom looks his part. Arthur Johnson plays the rich victim with his usual effectiveness. Florence Hackett has a minor role, but shows her ability in it. A good offering, not a great one.

"LADY MADCAP'S WAY" (Patheplay), December 25.—A picture featuring Asta Neilson and, of course, made abroad. It is in two parts and most of its scenes are too long. Its intention is to be spicy and to a large extent it is. In part, it is very clever and most of it is fresh; but it depends largely for its fun on cutting as close to what is vulgar as is possible without breaking through and would, on account of its courtship scenes, be more natural in the atmosphere of German life that in ours; but, then a good many of us are Germans. Lady Madcap dresses as a man and goes with a lieutenant on a visit to his uncle, a bachelor. Her object is to break up a proposed marriage the uncle wants to make for his nephew. The uncle innocently wants the nephew and his young "man friend" to sleep together and changes on the same situation are rung several times throughout the picture. It made a good deal of laughter and plainly was acceptable.

"A TUDOR PRINCESS" (Edison), December 26.—A two-reel romance of the time of Henry VIII, produced with the usual care and attention to details for which this company is noted. Mary Fuller, Ben. F. Wilson, Robert Brower and Charles Ogle appear in the large cast. The princess is forced to marry the French King, but later he dies and she is allowed to wed Brandon. The close grouping of unnecessary characters in some scenes gives a rather set effect and makes the action drag a little. The settings and photography are all that could be desired and the characterizations and costuming are excellent.

"THE GREAT GAME" (Essanay), December 26.—A two-reel subject with the stock market as its background. Thomas Commerford, E. H. Calvert and Irene Warfield appear in the cast. The story is an entertaining one, in which the son of the railroad magnate defeats his father's villainous plans. The scenes are many of them overdrawn and the acting palpably melodramatic. This of course detracts from the production in a way, but as a story of frustrated villainy it will please the average observer.

"HEARTEASE" (Vitagraph), December 27.—The opening scenes in this two-reel production are memorable for their beautiful photography and general charm of settings. The love story is idyllic. Later, on leaving France for England, the husband's cold temperament asserts itself and the observer gets first hint of the tragic occurrences to follow. The wife and younger son have the French warmth of heart and the father and the elder son make a cold contrast to this. The scenes following the wife's death were well put on but seemed like part of another story. Rogers Lytton and Carlotta De Felice have the leads and Paul Kelly and Kenneth Casey play the boys' parts very intelligently.

"THE MOTH AND THE FLAME" (Patheplay), December 27.—A two-part drama, in which Jeanie MacPherson appears as a young wife lured from her husband and child by a stranger who later deserts her. The devil appears to her in person, portrayed by Seymour Hastings. The reconciliation scenes were not so hurried as usual and consequently more convincing. Henry King and Bud Harris have prominent parts. The photography is good and the production, while of a rather sordid type, is quite strongly presented.

Independent

"THE ACTOR'S CHRISTMAS" (Imp), Dec. 22.—A down-and-out actor in this little Christmas drama is induced to play the part of Santa Claus in a rich man's home and while there is tempted to steal toys for his child. The spirit of the theft is recognized and the whole ends with much advantage all around. This is a pleasing production and has a real holiday flavor. King Baggot plays the part of the actor.

"MIKE AND JAKE LIVE CLOSE TO NATURE" (Joker), Jan. 7.—Mike and Jake appear in this burlesque as a couple of seekers after the simple life and we see them in all manner of adventures, clad in skins and sandals. They are unusually funny.

"SLIM'S LAST TRICK" (Frontier), Jan. 1.—In this amusing comedy Slim, a Western cowboy, buys out a magician and in giving his first public exhibition he has a very interesting time.

"THE WINNING STROKE" (Frontier), Jan. 3.—Representatives of two detective agencies meet on the same job, that of running down counterfeiters in the West, and they suspect one another until the show-down. The idea here is a good one, but it has not been worked out to the best advantage. The story is interesting enough, but it seems rather bootless near the end.

"MRS. PINKHURST'S PROXY" (Thanhouser), January 4.—A good humored burlesque in which Riley Chamberlain masquerades as a well-known militant suffragette. All goes well until his discovery, when he is helped out of town. This has several moments of an amusing sort, though it never becomes extremely laughable.

"THE BURNING TRAIN" (Itala).—The feature of this picture is a thrilling chase of a fast moving train by an automobile and the rescue of a child as the train catches fire and burns. The lives of the passengers are saved when the blazing cars are uncoupled from the locomotive and come to a stop.

"JUST MOTHER" (Powers), January 12.—In this pleasing little film story Laura Oakley appears as a mother whose daughters are ashamed of her. But when mother writes a prize-winning short story their appreciation of her becomes more pronounced. Three engagements furnish a humorous close to this amusing yarn.

"THE SNAKE CHARMER" (Eclair), January 11.—This is a half-reel farce comedy concerning a henpecked husband who rented the flute of a Hindoo snake charmer and by playing on it made his wife and mother-in-law act like snakes.

"NUTTY DELIVERS THE MESSAGE TO GARCIA" (Eclair), January 11.—On the other half of the above reel is this little story of Nutty, who was sent to deliver a canoe through the crowded streets of a city. His adventures are amusing.

"WHOSO DIGGETH A PIT" (Powers), January 9.—The girl who marries a dissolute broker to save her father in this drama is well characterized. The situation is well developed, and the scene in which the broker, threatening his wife with a revolver, accidentally shoots himself has an unusual dramatic value. The film is commendable throughout.

"AN ARROWHEAD ROMANCE" (Rex), January 8.—Bob Leonard has the lead in a slight story written around a summer resort. There are fine backgrounds and they are excellently photographed.

"THE CYCLE OF ADVERSITY" (Rex), January 11.—Robert Leonard plays the leading part, that of a linotyper who writes a successful play, in this drama, which has for its main theme the romance of the linotyper and a girl waiting on a lunch counter. After a series of incidents which threaten to break up their happiness, they are finally united. The story is somewhat disconnected, although it is easy to follow and the acting is fair.

"A KENTUCKY ROMANCE" (Kaybee), January 9.—A one-reel story of the Kentucky mountains, illustrating the manner in which a love affair running through many years finally winds up a feud. While not particularly new in any respect, the story is entertaining. Good photography and attractive scenes help to maintain the interest.

"THE RING" (Crystal) January 11.—This is the drama of a young woman who is almost led astray when her husband loses his money and she is compelled to assume the drudgery of a poor wife. Pearl White plays this part to good effect.

"IT MAY COME TO THIS" (Crystal), January 13.—We get a pretty good idea from the half reel production of conditions when women will come into their own and supplant man in the world of affairs. Some of the scenes are laughable.

"BALDY BELMONT'S BUMPS" (Crystal), January 13.—Baldy gets a telegram in this production sharing the reel with the above, which sends him flying post haste to see his wife and in so doing he meets with many accidents.

"IN THE CLUTCHES OF A GANG" (Keystone), January 8.—Another one of those thoroughly enjoyable burlesque pictures, in which nothing occurs that is to be taken seriously. Ford Sterling as Chief Teheezel has more than the usual amount of trouble. The arrest of the mayor and the scenes on the raft were highly amusing. A very successful nonsense offering.

"THE PRIDE OF THE FORCE" (Majestic), December 27.—This low comedy offering is not of a very pleasing type. Some of the scenes are too coarse. The adventures of the lady "cop" furnish numerous situations of an amusing nature, but should have been handled more carefully.

"THE BABY" (Majestic), December 30.—There is undoubtedly a good idea in this film, but it is put together hastily and lacks necessary feeling. The relationship of characters was not clear and the death of the wife was too sudden. Some of the scenes are well handled and the characterizations are quite pleasing.

"DAYBREAK" (Reliance), December 29.—This film does not tell a powerful story, but it is remarkable from the fact that but one person appears. It is really a film monologue. Louise Vale is the woman in the case. The situations pique the interest because of a certain enigmatic character which makes the observer wonder what is coming next. M. B. Havey wrote the scenario.

"EDUCATING HIS DAUGHTERS" (Majestic), January 3.—The plot in this film has been seen so much that it hardly serves to hold the interest any more. The young man masquerades as a governess. The production is not free from vulgarity and its pleasing photography is perhaps its strongest point.

"HELEN'S STRATAGEM" (Majestic), Dec. 28.—A political story of quite a pleasing sort, with Lamar Johnston and Muriel Ostriche in the leading roles. The young candidate weakly yields to the dictation of the bosses, but the invalid sister changes his letter and makes him refuse to comply with their wishes. The story has a pleasing close.

"THE FRESH FRESHMAN" (Apollo), December 28.—This is a breezy comedy, in which Fred Mace is mistaken for the young freshman on his way to college. The situations at the close are quite funny and serve to bring out laughter from the observers. The photography is a little hazy in places.

"AN AMATEUR ANIMAL TRAINER" (Thanhouser), December 30.—There is an original conception of an amusing nature in this film, but it was not made the most of. The lover is given a job taming elephants and is given the assistance of the always pleasing Thanhouser Kidlet. This idea is not worked out forcibly enough but proves quite entertaining as it stands.

'THEIR GOLDEN WEDDING" (Thanhouser), January 2.—This film does not exactly contain a plot in the ordinary sense of the word. It shows the recollections of an aged man, dating back to 1861 when he served in the Civil War. There is no suspense and not much of a story, though the scenes are quite interesting.

"SOME NIGHT MARE" (Joker), January 10.—A number featuring Max Ascher. There is more horse play than humor in this, but it has moments that will appeal strongly to certain audiences.

"CROSS ROADS" (Frontier), January 10.—A ranch comedy-drama revolving about the filing of a mining claim. The story, while old, moves briskly and the splendid horseback riding and agreeable scenic effects help along the interest.

"SLIM'S STRATEGY" (Frontier), January 8.—A ranch comedy in which Slim and the other cowboys have designs on the freshly made pies. The humor is of a conventional order and the production is helped out very much by pleasing photography and attractive scenic effects.

"THE CURE" (Broncho), January 14.—A one-reel humorous number, written by William C. Clifford. Mrs. Wimble is a suffragette and her husband, to cure her of this, enlists the aid of a ward politician named Murphy. The scenes at the reception were interesting enough, but Mrs. Wimble's reasons for changing her mind were not presented very forcefully. In fact, some observers were not at all clear on this point. The letter insert was shown very briefly.

"LOVE AND DYNAMITE" (Keystone), January 3.—This is one of the best-devised nonsense comedies recently released by this company. Sterling opens up a lot of amusing situations when he visits the den of the villain and procures a barrel of dynamite. A burlesque offering chock full of harmless amusement.

"A MISPLACED FOOT" (Keystone), January 1.—A half reel comedy, in which Mabel indulges in a flirtation with her feet, under the table. The situations are only fairly amusing.

"A GLIMPSE OF THE CITY OF LOS ANGELES" (Keystone), January 1.—On same reel with above. Some very fine views of Los Angeles, showing numerous historic spots and views of the parks and other points of interest.

"A WARTIME REFORMATION" (Gold Seal), January 13.—Francis Ford in these two reels puts over some stirring battle scenes, and also as a guerilla plays the lead. Grace Cunard has the role of a daughter of a mountainer and does strong work. There is an abundance of action, and the interest is well sustained.

"THE INTRUDER" (Nestor), January 14.—Wallace Reid and Dorothy Davenport appear to very good advantage in this rather simple, but straightforward story. The spectator is never puzzled to know what might be the significance of the scene he is viewing; at the same time there is no lack of interest. A young woodsman, just married, almost loses his wife to a rascally city man while he is building a house for the new bride. She changes her mind before it is too late and returns to her husband who welcomes her back while he shoots the man who tried to steal her from him. The photography is particularly to be commended.

Independent Specials

"THE LUCKY NUGGET" (Ammex).—A three-part special feature picture telling a story of the West when to travel across the plains was an undertaking full of danger. It is really a two-reel picture with a sequel "twenty years later." "The Lucky Nugget" is, in an early scene, hung around the neck of a child by its mother at the start of a wagon journey across the plains with a guide. They lose the way and the mother dies of thirst. The man takes the boy and they reach a water hole where they fall asleep and are discovered by an Indian girl who brings the tribe. The guide escapes, the boy is captured and adopted. Twenty years later, the boy, now a chieftain, is in a battle with the whites due to the killing of two white men and the capture of a white girl, whom he has set free. He is wounded and the nugget is discovered by his father, who saves his life and takes him home, where he is restored to civilization and loves the white girl. This is all very like other pictures; is fairly interesting without being at all impressive.

"VENGEANCE BEQUEATHED" (Film Releases of America).—A four-part offering made in Germany. Its foreign atmosphere will help it. The story is very sentimental. Two sisters swear never to marry till they discover the man who had wronged a dead elder sister. They are on the vaudeville stage and the same man pays attention to one of them much to the other's distress. Later, she finds that he is the man they are seeking and, after a series of scenes not without merit as entertainment, the man, dying from a wound given by the older sister, begs forgiveness. The chase of one sister by the man's groom over the city; and the old-world, mysterious hidden rooms and hidden secret stairs of the man's castle through which the other sister chases him are the picture's best parts. It is a fair offering as a sensational melodrama.

"LOVE OR A THRONE" (Imp), Dec. 25.—This two reel film was produced abroad, in the grounds of a wealthy German near Berlin, and while the settings are not quite so effective as they might have been under the circumstances, they have an unusual appeal. The story tells about the love of a crown prince for an opera singer, whom he is called upon to renounce when his father dies and he becomes king. This he does, but when the girl saves his life during an attempt to assassinate him, he abdicates in favor of a younger brother. Miss Leah Baird plays the part of the opera singer with very good effect.

"MIRACLE MARY" (Victor), Dec. 26.—This is a two-part Christmas story based on the fiction by John A. Moroso in the Christmas number of the "American Magazine." The miracle referred to in the title and frequently in the play is that of a motion picture establishing an alibi for a convict who has been wrongfully imprisoned; not so much of a miracle as an accident, yet with good qualities as a climax. The story is interesting throughout and Fritzi Bruneteee in the title role is rather charming.

"WHEN URSUS THREW THE BULL" (Nestor), January 9.—This is a take-off on "Quo Vadis?" and it presents an extremely laughable two-reel burlesque. The bull, which happens to be a cow, plays one of the leading parts and his substitute, a made-up animal, is no less amusing than he. On the whole this film will be well received. The final scenes are particularly to be commended.

"CONSCIENCE" (Broncho), January 14.—A two-reel Western offering, written by Richard V. Spencer. Haggerty goes West after committing a crime and poses as a minister. His work affects his dormant conscience and he refuses to go back to the old life when his pal arrives. The rugged scenery and pleasing photography help the story, which conveys quite a strong moral. The view of the diggings was particularly good.

"THE HARP OF TARA" (Domino), January 8.—A two-reel Irish story, written by Wm. H. Clifford. This follows in the wake of former successes. The settings are pleasing and some good photographic effects are achieved, particularly that of the goat herd in the moonlights. Some of the character work is better than usual and the fighting scenes are full of life. The story of the harp was interesting, but it did not seem that the most was made of it, particularly toward the close, where the situations were rather weak.

"AT THE ELEVENTH HOUR" (Bison), January 10.—We recommend this two-reel production mainly for its scenery, a daring ride in a water flume and the destruction of an automobile which plunges over a precipice and then rolls a frightful distance down a mountainside. The story is interesting and tells of a contest between two men over a will. The situation begins in the East and ends in the West, where most of the drama is played. This is a pretty good production.

"GIOVANNI'S GRATITUDE" (Reliance), December 27.—A two-reel number, written by Russell E. Smith. This works up to a pleasing climax in the second reel. Jack Pickford, George Siegman, Irene Hunt and Ethel Kaufman appear. The scenes lack atmosphere is certain respects and the photography was hazy in places. The story is one of an Italian boy who comes to the aid of the people who befriended him at a critical moment. There is considerable melodrama in the production.

"ZU ZU, THE BAND LEADER" (Keystone), Dec. 24.—A prolonged nonsensical number, which tickles the audience mightily and ends in a riot of fun. Ford Sterling impersonates a band leader. The flirtatious Mabel creates trouble between her admirer, Caesar, and the leader. The scenes are located at Venice, California. The story could have been told in one reel, but Keystone fans will welcome both reels. The last scenes are intensely funny. Two reels of harmless amusement of an enjoyable sort.

"THE FIRST NUGGET" (Eclair), January 14.—This is a powerful drama of the Great Northwest, with Barbara Tennant and O. A. C. Lund in the leading roles. This gets a capital start and sweeps the interest along till the close of the two reels. All of the scenes are well photographed and there are some very pleasing mountain views. The flogging of the sick Indians and the hand-to-hand fight were unnecessarily brutal. The ride down the rapids in the boat and the Indian's display of heroism was very stirring. A strong production.

"THE CORYPHEE" (Victor), January 2.—A two-reel subject featuring Florence Lawrence as a theatrical girl who visits the home of her married cousin. In the second reel the big scene occurs in which she saves her cousin by assuming that the midnight visitor came to see herself. This situation, which occurs, we believe, in "The School for Scandal," is given a modern setting. It is handled delicately and with good suspense. The production as a whole makes a strong offering.

"THE NARCOTIC SPECTRE" (Kaybee), January 9.—This is a two-reel number, written by William C. Clifford. It is particularly commendable for its fine Western scenery and the genuine Indians which appear. The story concerns a military officer, just recalled from China, who is addicted to the opium habit. He has a vivid dream, fully pictured in the film, in which the redskins attack the fort. This dream induces him to give up opium smoking. Certain unpleasant features of the plot keep it from being a great success, though it is well constructed throughout.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

ONE of the Paris newspapers, according to a dispatch to the Times of this city, advocates a state moving picture theater, supported just as the government provides for the maintenance of the Opera Comedie Francaise and other houses. Le Matin says:

"Why not a national cinema? It has become a favorite pleasure to an immense public. Each day millions of persons meet in obscure rooms and watch stupid scenes. Why not popularize the great tragedies and dramas? The artistic and educative value of the cinema is failing rapidly because of our snobbish attitude. This would all be changed with the dignified establishment of a state-controlled cinema."

Why a national cinema? True it is that the picture "has become a favorite pleasure to an immense public." It would seem to be about the only bit of truth in the foregoing statement of the French writer. If he ever enters the "obscure rooms" he will know that the great tragedies and dramas are being popularized and without the pauperizing taint of any government money either. Many of them have been filmed right in Paris by the Pathe and Gaumont and Eclair firms. It is not necessary to mention any of the numerous notable subjects that have been made on the other side of the water, let alone many produced on this side and all of which have been shown in Europe. The artistic and educative value of the cinema distinctly is not failing rapidly, in spite of the snobbish attitude of a diminishing number of self-sufficient and superior persons. The artistic and educative value of the cinema, as the foreigners choose to describe it, was never so great as it is at the beginning of this year 1914. Before another new year comes in still greater things will have been set down to the credit of the motion picture. Just to mention two of the agencies that will contribute to this end, and the news of which has but recently "broke," there are the Ford-Stanhope-Morange alliance with the Famous Players and the million-dollar capitalization of Reliance. Then there are the Broadway Features of the Vitagraph Company and the K. & E.-Biograph combination. Lubin is going in for big stuff, and he like the others named has abundant facilities as well as capital. There are other concerns in the field and more coming who promise big accomplishments in screen portrayals. All these are on one side of the ocean. On the other, there is every reason to believe, the same strides will be made in the months ahead of us.

Why a national cinema? There was a time, now several years since, when something of the sort might have helped a bit. At that time, however, the proposition would have been ridiculed by far more than will do so today, and for a far different reason. Then the greater public would have said something like: "Moving pictures? Nothing in 'em!" Today the same persons will very pertinently ask in what way can the government improve the motion picture. They will point out that the subsidized theater is in its essence of restricted and local benefit. The advantage that filters out over the nation is slight and indirect. The theater is even more than the tariff, as General Hancock described it, a "local issue." It concerns its immediate community. The picture, on the other hand, is of universal scope. It ranges the wide world. New York City, with its five million inhabitants, may be too small to return a profit to the maker of a big production. It doesn't have to, because duplications of the same subject will be making money in Cape Town and in Nome.

There is no occasion for a national cinema anywhere, not even in France. If the government there is anxious to show recognition of the great popularity of the picture let it remove some of the tax impositions, petty and great, with which it now handicaps its exhibition.

Kessell & Baumann, of the New York Motion Picture Company, who were the successful bidders for the souvenir program at the Screeners' ball last year, have notified President Baggot that they will this year make the first bid in the sum that last year was the highest—$1,000. The ball of the Screeners will be held on Saturday, January 31.

Acton Davies, dramatic critic of the Evening Sun, who is also supervising selected scripts at the Edison studio, shows the influence on his vocabulary of his new surroundings when in a criticism he said the other day: "Like a photograph which has gone wrong, Mr. Bernard Shaw suffers in this instance from a virulent case of overexposure."

Carl Von Hoffman left New York on December 27 for El Paso, Texas, en route for Chihuahua, Mexico. There he will join the rebel army in its advance upon the City of Mexico and will record with his camera such events as he believes will appeal to the patrons of the Mutual Film Corporation, by which he is sent. Mr. Von Hoffman has just returned from a three month's trip to South America, where he took his camera in the interests of a commercial enterprise. He is a young man, but has had his share of experiences and adventures. Among these was when, as an officer in the Russian army, he was bottled up in Port Arthur by the Japanese. Accompanying the cameraman will be Sherman Martin, formerly of the New York Sun, as assistant, and F. U. Thayer as guide.

Henry B. Walthall is one of the best as he is also one of the best-known players on the screen. He is of the type of Arthur Johnson and Arthur Mackley—his work is so natural, so lifelike, that illusion is established on his initial appearance in a picture. Off the screen his manner is retiring. In conversing with him you are struck by the quality of his voice. The feeling is irresistible that in spite of the many advantages of the camera it does take from an actor one of his great assets. It is plain, however, that if Mr. Walthall remains on the screen and off of the stage it is because, like many of his fellow players, he does so from choice. His last four seasons before the footlights were with the celebrated combination of Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin. He appeared with them in "The Great Divide" and other productions. Mr. Walthall's first appearance in pictures was with the Biograph Company five years ago. During the summer vacation he had called at the studio to visit a former fellow-player, James Kirkwood—it was under Mr. Kirkwood's direction, by the way, that we last week saw Mr. Walthall working in the Reliance studio. Mr. Kirkwood introduced his guest to D. W. Griffith, who, noting that the visitor was interested in the making of a picture, invited him to try his hand at it. Mr. Walthall was so attracted by the work that at the conclusion of a ten week's London engagement with Mr. Miller he became a member of the Biograph Company, where he remained a year. Then he appeared in Reliance pictures; for six months he was with the Pathe Company and then returned to Reliance. Then he rejoined Mr. Griffith's forces at the Biograph, and, with his old-time director, went over to the brand under which he had twice before played. In the Reliance studio are many of Mr. Walthall's fellow-players, among others, Messrs. Kirkwood, Cabanne, Harron, Bitzer and Eddie Dillon and Miss Mae Marsh and Miss Blanche Sweet.

Henry B. Walthall.

Mr. Walthall came to New York in 1901, when for a short time he was an extra under the management of Henry V. Donnelly in the Murray Hill Theater stock company. Then followed stock work in Providence, R. I., and on the road. For a season he played Captain Clay Randolph in Edward McWade's Civil War drama "Winchester." He was with Lottie Blair Parker's "Under Southern Skies" for three seasons in the role of Steve Danbury. Then followed his engagement with Mr. Miller. Mr. Walthall says he is happy in his present home, surrounded by so many of the friends with whom he was associated in his "initiation into the art of keeping quiet," as he quaintly phrases it.

Howard Missimer, so well known through his long work with the Essanay Company, is back on Broadway after a three months' sojourn in the hills of Putnam County. It was late in the summer when Mr. Missimer's physician told him he needed fifteen or twenty more pounds added to his weight. The comedian accepted the invitation of Raymond Hitchcock to put in a few months on his farm. There he drank six quarts of milk every day, picked apples when there were apples to pick, chopped real wood with a regular axe, climbed hills and slept outdoors. He came back to town early in December twenty-four pounds heavier than when he went away and as hard as nails. He is still carrying some of the accumulated tan and looks fit as a fiddle. Mr. Missimer has just finished working in a Famous Players production with Jack Barrymore, "The American Citizen," in which he played the English lord.

"The Vavasour Ball."

Special Vitagraph Feature in Two Parts.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

HIGH comedy of original plot, this entertaining feature offers a criticism of character that is effective without being obtrusive; amusing in its situations, it drives straight at a dangerously common form of vanity and incidentally touches on the delicate art of lying without uttering a word. But for the nourishment furnished by press agents and trade-paper boosters, lying might suffer a serious relapse into the coma of commonplace, now that telling the truth and staying sober are becoming fashionable.

Francis Livingston is credited with being the author of "The Vavasour Ball," and talented Marguerite Bertsch had to do with its reconstruction—she "picturized" it—but they both skimmed over and skirted around some of the complications resulting from the plot. Perhaps they were limited to two reels, but interest was aroused in several minor issues brought to no conclusion. A thumb-nail sketch of the story may serve in explanation.

Leo Delaney, dramatist, tells his wife, Nora Talmadge, via subtitle, that he can not spare her money "for a new gown," as he needs it to put on his "new play." She is set on having a new gown for the Vavasour Ball and decides to pawn her only necklace, one of peculiar design, without telling her husband how she managed to raise the money. She leaves the jewels with a pawnbroker, Van Dyke Brooke, satisfies her sex craving—ladies depend upon appearances rather than conduct to make an impression—and goes to the ball in gorgeous array, explaining the absence of the necklace by declaring it out of harmony with her attire.

She goes alone, while the husband, who had intended to stay home and scheme—he has already tried to borrow from the same pawnbroker—is induced to look in at a less formal affair at the studio of an artist in search of Hebrew types for a great picture. The artist has invited, with characteristic lack of discrimination, the daughter of the pawnbroker, Ada Gifford, and she steals the necklace from her father's safe from the same motive that led the dramatist's wife to pawn her jewels.

The dramatist recognizes the necklace at the artist's studio, pretends love for the wearer and manages to obtain possession of the coveted article. He makes a quick getaway, goes home and finds the pawn ticket in a safe where the jewels were kept. Meanwhile, the loss is discovered, and the man who hurried away is suspected. The unhappy Jewess returns home in shame and confesses her guilt. Ethics become decidedly mixed when the dramatist visits the pawnbroker with both trinket and ticket and holds up the poor old man for a heavy loan.

Unless the moral that virtue is its own reward is to be conveyed, the honest pawnbroker being the principle sufferer. the young Jewess should have entered at the moment of the hold-up and identified the thief. "When a reasonable expectation is aroused, it can be baffled only at the author's peril," says an authority on play-making. The situation would have become more complicated than ever, big enough for one or two more reels, and some delightful ingenuity could however, and serves its purpose, though in lesser degree than have been expended in solving it. The comedy is well acted, might have been expected under the circumstances. Perhaps it would be spoiled by any attempt to make it appear probable. One who is well-posted on the subject says, "in this day of discreditable facts, lying for its own sake has become one of the fine arts."

JOURJON IN NEW YORK.

Mr. Charles Jourjon, president of the Eclair Company, of Paris, is in New York on a visit to the American branch of his company. Mr. Jourjon is spending his time between the Eclair offices at 225 West 42nd Street and the studio and laboratories at Fort Lee, N. J., and seems pleased with the progress the company is making here. It is his company's intention, said Mr. Jourjon, to enlarge the studio and factory at Fort Lee during the coming year. Additional ground will be purchased to accommodate new buildings. One of the innovations installed at the factory is an automatic machine for developing and toning.

"Eclair has almost ready for the market," said Mr. Jourjon, "a new projecting machine which is called 'Kineclair.' This is a small machine which carries standard film, and is especially adapted for use in churches, schools and other institutions, and is especially convenient for traveling salesmen who desire to use up-to-date methods in selling goods. 'Kineclair' is also suitable for home use. We will have more to say about this device soon.

"Another device upon which we have spent much time and thought is the Gillon Camera," continued Mr. Jourjon. "This camera is an entirely new machine for the taking of motion pictures, and is distinctive in many ways. It is smaller in size and lighter than any other camera and is about as near perfection as mechanical genius can achieve. The Eclair Company has purchased the rights for this camera, and is now making them for general sale."

It is Mr. Jourjon's intention to remain in New York for several weeks before returning to Paris.

CHANGE IN VITAGRAPH RELEASES.

The two Vitagraph special two-part pictures, for the week of January 5, have been reversed. Instead of releasing "Officer John Donovan," on January 6, and "Jerry's Uncle's Namesake," on January 10, which were announced in the advertisement of the Vitagraph company and elsewhere in last week's issue, the former subject will now be released on January 10 and the latter on January 6. The change will also be noted in the Vitagraph advertisement in this issue and in the Calendar of Licensed Releases and Licensed Release Dates. Exhibitors will please make note of the reversal.

"BLINKIE'S" BUSINESS BOOMING.

On the first of January Albert Blinkhorn will increase his office space in the World's Tower Bldg. One-half of the 19th floor will be devoted to the ever increasing business of Blinkhorn's Films Agency. The shipping department is to be greatly enlarged and a special show-room for the Movoscope (home projector), will adjoin a projecting theater of unique design.

"Her Guilty Secret"

A Fine Three-Part Gaumont Drama Notable for Strong Acting and Splendid Backgrounds.

By George Blaisdell.

THE Gaumont Company will release on February 14th a three-part drama that contains the best elements of a good picture. The story is simple and there are few characters—and these are players of sterling merit. It is a human story, and it will have wide appeal. Most of the scenes are with old ocean for a background. We see it in varying moods—unruffled at times; at others great swells smash and tumble over huge rocks as thickly sprinkled along the cliffed shore as if the locale were the coast of Maine.

Scene from "Her Guilty Secret" (Gaumont).

M. Igarry is the mayor of a little town. He has been a widower for several years. He takes his little daughter to school and meets the teacher. The two fall in love. The mayor declares his affection, but the teacher hesitates. The next day she writes the mayor a letter confessing that she has a son twenty-five years old. Before the letter is mailed word comes from the son to meet him in the usual place that afternoon, as he is leaving for America. The mother goes, and to the son gives a pocketbook containing all her possessions. M. Igarry sees the two embrace, and in rage tries to shoot the man. The weapon misses fire and the mayor throws it to the ground. Two men find the pistol and waylay the son. The next morning a customs officer finds the body of the young man. On it is a photograph of the teacher. Nearby is a pistol with the name of the mayor on the handle. The mayor is arrested. The mother, thinking him the murderer, spurns him. It is the customs officer who is not satisfied that the mayor is guilty. He comes across the two men who are hiding in a cliff and brings them in. On one of them is the pocketbook. The mayor is released and all ends happily.

Madame Renee Carl is the teacher. She is known to all picturegoers, for she has been in Gaumont films for years. It is a marvelous face she has for silent acting—especially for tragic parts. She has abundant opportunity in "Her Guilty Secret" for the display of her art. Some of her strongest scenes were with Susanne Trivet, who plays the daughter of the mayor. The child of five years appeals to the woman. Her father is in prison; her teacher is her nearest friend. The woman believes the father of the little one is the murderer of her son—and we have a right to infer that the mother has also been a father to the dead man. The teacher hesitates long; but after a struggle she takes the child in her arms. Susanne has unusual talent. There is a depth of pathos in the scene in the police station when she asks of the guard: "Where is papa?" At another time, as the child mind endeavors to fathom the tragic circumstances that have so suddenly overwhelmed her home, she looks, for several moments, steadily into the eye of the camera—into your eye—and you feel just what she feels.

M. Navarre, who will be remembered as Fantomas, has the role of the mayor. The work that falls to him in this picture is of an entirely different character from that of the detective story; it is a finished impersonation—restrained, impressive and convincing. M. Breon, the custom guard, is natural. Behind the stern exterior he shows human sympathy in distress. The work of the entire cast is of the best—the judge, the maid, and the police authorities. The director is entitled to credit not only for his selection of artistic backgrounds, but also for his craftsmanlike management.

INTER-CONTINENT FILM CO. BEGINS.

Fred R. Jones, prominent in New York for many years as a publisher, is the president of the Inter-Continent Film Company, which has recently been reorganized along rather broad lines. The Inter-Continent Company will handle the American rights on all productions of the Verafilm Company, of Rome, Italy, a new association of many former associates of the Cines Company of the same city. In addition, the Inter-Continent will have the American territorial rights for two new companies at Copenhagen, Denmark. Along with this import feature, the same corporation will produce one feature production monthly beginning in February, and also a series of educational films conceived especially for export to Japan and China, and to be known as the Golden Dragon films. F. Baske Yamado, a well-known Japanese-American artist, and now a resident of Tokio, Japan, is the art director of the Inter-Continent Company, and will have general supervision of original films for export to the Orient, and also the buying of a general line of films, both new and second-hand, for use by exhibitors in both China and Japan. Alberto Tarchiani, a former editorial member of the famous Italian newspaper, Tribuna, of Rome, will have charge of the Italian import department. Mr. Tarchiani has been in close touch with the Italian film market for a number of years, but has not given it his entire attention until the present time, and a number of articles which he has written on the subject show that he possesses many new and comprehensive ideas as to this end of the film business. Mrs. Tarchiani will have charge of the sales department of the Inter-Continent, and she will bring to this company the experiences acquired during several years of highly successful work as a general film sales agent to exhibitors. The Inter-Continent will probably make the new three-reel production of the Verafilm Company, "Her Life for Liberty," its first release. A much more pretentious production will be "Rome or Death" by the same company. Release dates will be January 15th and 20th for both features. Executive offices of this company are in the World's Tower Building, 110-112 West 40th Street, New York.

The Army in Films.

The Extraordinary and Novel Work Done by Major Thomas J. Dickson—The Motion Picture Considered the Best Medium for Military Instruction.

By W. Stephen Bush.

I HAD a most interesting and instructive talk with Major Thomas J. Dickson, of the Sixth Field Artillery (Horse). Major Dickson is at present staying in the city of New York under orders from the War Department at Washington. The state of New York requested his presence in the city for of delivering in the large armories, a series of lectures on the Mobile Army.

Major T. J. Dickson.

With this end in view, the Major has enlisted the aid of the motion picture. Realizing the unsurpassed educational value of the picture in motion, and fully aware of its special adaptability as a medium of imparting military instruction, the Major has produced about 8,000 feet of motion pictures showing large bodies of infantry, cavalry and artillery in action. Among the incidents of the maneuvering work a minor problem in infantry is worked out with marvelous realism and perfect technical accuracy. It is the ideal mimic warfare. The maneuvers follow a plan of action much as the director follows a dramatic scenario."

"Take this example," said the Major, warming to his subject. "The orderly delivers a message from the commanding officer to assemble one company at once. Call to arms is sounded. In a few minutes the company is on the 'hike' in the direction of the supposed enemy. The point advances and is soon in contact with the enemy. Flankers join the point. Connecting files inform the main command that the preliminary skirmish is on. After a series of evolutions the entire company goes into action, and the various movements illustrating advancing by squads, by skirmishers, and by thin line are executed. The engagement is successful and closes with rapid fire and bayonet charge.

"The cavalry maneuvers are extremely interesting. One patrol harasses the enemy. Another patrol crawls up to the brow of a hill, locates the enemy and sends back a message to the troop commander. Horses are changed at relay stations with thrilling and realistic swiftness, and the troop moves out, dismounting, and fights on foot. The artillery movements are exciting in the extreme. Batteries are seen going into action, portraying on the screen the most magnificent picture of warfare that has ever been produced. The greatest and most famous battle scenes on canvas seem tame indeed as compared to these rushes and onslaughts by men and horses and guns in rapid motion. Never have the possibilities of the motion picture as a means of reproducing the scenes of war been realized more completely, and, at the same time, more accurately and more precisely than in these truly wonderful films. This is the opinion voiced not by me but by some of the most famous military experts and tacticians who have seen my pictures."

Speaking at greater length of the effects produced by his pictures on audiences consisting of trained military men, and on civil war veterans, the Major said that the highest military authorities had warmly complimented him upon his work. When he had shown his films at Harrisburg at the request of Thomas J. Stewart, Adjutant General of Pennsylvania, some civil war veterans, who had been among his audience, told Major Dickson that they had learned more of warfare that evening than during their experience in the great war between the states.

These pictures are usually witnessed by the men of affairs in the community where they are exhibited. The Major's audiences at times are so large that he has to use a megaphone during the course of his lecture. Men come from a radius of fifty and sometimes eighty miles to attend these exhibitions and to hear these lectures. These films have created favorable comment in army circles generally. No other country has so far succeeded in getting such extensive maneuvers on the screen, strictly following all military rules.

The scope of the Major's work contemplates far more than what he has accomplished up to now. He will shortly begin work on a series that will cover the entire activity of the army of the United States in all its branches.

"The making of these films," concluded Major Dickson, "is not in any sense a commercial venture. I show them only as I am ordered by the War Department. The War Department, in these instances, generally acts only upon the request of the military authorities of a state. In some respects this work is still in an experimental stage. Later I hope to devise a plan whereby the people of the country can see these films in the moving picture houses. Until these plans are fully matured and ready for execution I will not be in a position to heed any requests for general exhibitions. The first showing of the films in the city of New York will take place on January 5th, in the Second Field Artillery Armory, 171 Clermont Avenue, Brooklyn."

Other dates have been set as follows:

January 6th—22nd Engineers', Fort Washington Avenue and 168th Street, New York City.

January 7th—47th Infantry, Marcy Avenue and Heyward Street, Brooklyn.

January 8th—12th Infantry, Columbus Avenue and 62nd Street, New York City.

January 9th—23rd Infantry, 1322 Bedford Avenue, Brooklyn.

January 10th—8th Artillery District, Park Avenue and 94th Street, New York City.

January 12th—2nd Field Artillery, Franklin Avenue and 166th Street, Bronx.

January 13th—1st Field Artillery, Broadway and 68th Street, New York City.

January 14th—14th Infantry, Eighth Avenue and 15th Street, Brooklyn.

January 15th—71st Infantry, Park Avenue and 34th Street, New York City.

January 16th—7th Infantry, Park Avenue and 66th Street, New York City.

January 17th—69th Infantry, 68 Lexington Avenue, New York Citv.

After filling the New York engagements Major Dickson has been ordered to show these films before the War College at Washington. The public will be admitted to all of the above exhibitions and no admission will be charged.

CONCERNING THAT "VITAGRAPH" THEATER.

Within a few weeks, as you proceed along Times or Longacre Squares, there will be conspicuously seen, flashing amid the bright lights of the Great White Way, an electric sign bearing the device—"The Vitagraph Theater." In this magnificently appointed motion picture theater will be shown the greatest and latest multiple releases of the Vitagraph Company. It is here they will receive the critical "once-over" of the reviewers, the approval of the "first-nighters" and the endorsement of metropolitan sanction, serving as a guarantee for merit and superiority before their general distribution throughout the country, as "Broadway Star Features."

At these special exhibitions, many novel and artistic methods of presentation will be shown that will be of value to the exhibitor in the most improved styles of putting them on the screen, giving new ideas for displaying them, under the most up to date and original conception of surroundings, advancing the newest designs in screen framing, lobby display; in fact, everything that will tend to set forth the latest and best paraphernalia in motion picture theater furnishings. It will be a continuous exposition of ways and means to improve the art and advance the business interests of everyone concerned.

A. H. SAWYER LEAVES KINEMACOLOR.

January first saw the retirement from the Kinemacolor Company of America of A. H. Sawyer, who has been with the company for four years as secretary and manager. What his plans are he declined to state at this time, but as he has taken a temporary office at 15 East 26th Street, it looks as though Mr. Sawyer intended to tackle the feature film game. He is considering several offers, but has accepted none. Mr. Sawyer is said to be in close touch with one of the big producing firms in the theatrical game and it is thought by some that his plans may include a combination with this firm in making feature films of some of their big successes using the pictures in their houses, many of which will be open for attractions in the spring. As he has been in the picture game for about ten years operating several houses of his own before he went with Kinemacolor, and as he is generally regarded a keen business man, his next move will undoubtedly be of much interest to the trade.

"A Waif of the Plains"

A Warner's Feature in Three Parts Commendable for Naturalness—Story of Frontier Life Newly Treated.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THERE have been so many moving picture travesties of Western life and of frontier days that these subjects have lost much of their popularity. If there ever will be a revival of Western drama, it must come through such productions as "A Waif of the Plains," bearing the "Miller Brothers Ranch 101" brand, which is about to be released by the Warner Features.

Scene from "A Waif of the Plains" (Warner's Features).

The dominating charm of this feature is its absolute naturalness. Whether the director portrays the movements of large bodies of men and animals on the plains or whether he gives us close views of dramatic and pathetic interest, he succeeds in making things look real and natural. Higher praise than this cannot be bestowed on any motion picture, but in a picture of frontier life and frontier days this naturalness is doubly welcome. There is not an inch of padding in the film, which in these days of inflated features is no small merit. The director displays a rare combination of valuable qualities, understands the technique of the camera at all ranges, and possesses the dramatic instinct in a marked degree. It would be easy to enumerate instances of his skill, which shines especially in his painstaking attention to details and his finishing touches.

The story told in these reels is not new, but the treatment of the story is most refreshingly new. Tales and legends of white children reared by Indians and through strange adventures restored to their own race are familiar to us ever since the days of Simon Kent. Out of such ordinary materials the director has woven a veritable screen masterpiece. We get a glimpse of the true Indian character, for the red man is shown here both as a cruel foe and as a noble friend capable of the greatest sacrifice.

The first reel, usually the most difficult, is fully as strong as the other two, and I liked the pose and the acting of the two little children very much. Touches of genuine dramatic art are found all through the production, which does not contain one single indoor scene. The movements of the herds of longhorns were convincingly real and the buffalo rushing over the plains and hills afford a thrilling sight. The action moves smoothly and rapidly from scene to scene and absolutely explains itself. There are but very few titles and even these might have been omitted without making it any harder to understand the sequence of events.

The acting of the principal characters is entirely free from exaggeration and camera-consciousness. Altogether, I consider this feature one of decided merit and an attraction on every program.

Who Will Help?

Dire Straits of Old Moving Picture Man Call for Immediate Response.

It is a pitiful story of misfortune, privation and sorrow that has been brought to the notice of the Moving Picture World by Mr. Rich. G. Hollaman concerning that old time moving picture man, William Paley. It will be remembered that Mr. Paley suffered a severe injury to his foot something more than a year ago while employed as a cameraman with a company at Los Angeles. As a result of that accident an amputation was necessary.

When the matter was brought to the attention of the Moving Picture World an effort was made to raise a fund for Mr. Paley's assistance. In this effort the Photoplayers of Los Angeles took an active part and the immediate needs of Mr. Paley and his wife were provided for. Regarding Mr. Paley's present circumstances, Mr. Hollaman's letter offers the best explanation:

New York, December 29, 1913.

"Editor Moving Picture World,

"Dear Sir: I was much distressed to receive the following letter the day before Christmas. At this season of 'Good Will Toward Man,' I feel that many of your readers who knew the writer in the early days of the business will feel as distressed as I am at the terrible misfortunes that have overcome the old cameraman, William Paley."

Los Angeles, December 20, 1913.

Mr. Rich. G. Hollaman,

Can you sympathize and assist me to exist and get an artificial leg. I feel the loss of my wife keenly and am almost penniless. Not a single person has called to see me in my little shack, rent for which is paid for two weeks, then the street or poor house, without I get some assistance. The Masons took charge of the funeral. Mrs. P. was taken away from me December 8, when she was taken to the undertakers and I never saw her after. Doctor would not allow me to go; I was broken up and nervously weak, the doctor being afraid I might collapse, fall and hurt the stump of my leg. I don't ask for charity, but sympathy to enable me to exist. Doctor says he can get an artificial leg on me in six weeks. My cup of trouble is full. A position is waiting for me, but without assistance I will not be able to get the leg or exist much longer. One year and ten months my heart has been breaking and my angel has gone after thirty-six years of married life.

WILLIAM PALEY.

"Personally, I have sent money assistance to him, but feel sure there are many wealthy men in the picture business whose heart strings may be touched by the above appeal. Thanking you personally for publishing this letter and hoping for some result to relieve Paley's terrible condition, Yours very truly, Rich. G. Hollaman."

It would seem that, with all the evidences of prosperity, even opulence, enjoyed by many of the men who knew William Paley and struggled with him in the early days of the motion picture, there might be found some not so deeply involved in schemes for their personal comfort who would be willing to divert a portion of their good fortune for the assistance of an unfortunate member of the craft.

Mr. Hollaman has set an example that is worthy of emulation. The proprietors of the Moving Picture World have also forwarded their contribution. Mr. Paley's address is 380 Patton Street, Los Angeles, Cal. If you would experience the "joy of giving" to the fullest extent, take this opportunity. Contributions sent to the Moving Picture World will be forwarded. Let it be today.

Vitagraph Comes to Paley's Aid.

Since the above item was put in type, word comes that the moving picture people at the Vitagraph Company's plant are taking up a subscription for Mr. Paley, which is expected to reach a considerable sum. The members of the company have headed the list with a substantial donation.

Nicholas Power Contributes.

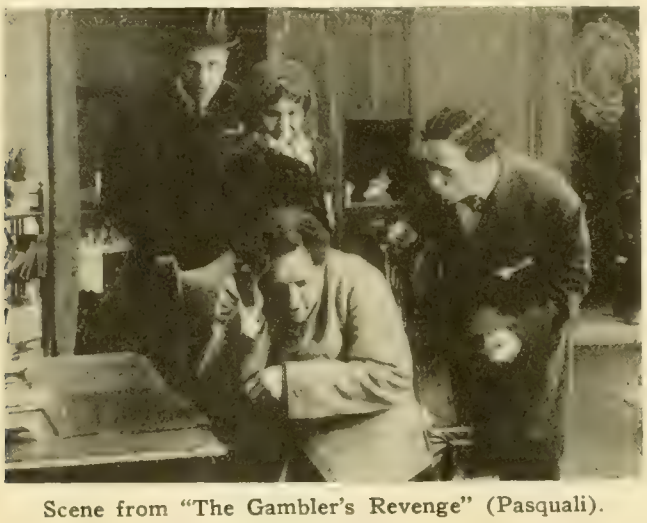
In a letter to THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, Mr. Nicholas Power, president of the Nicholas Power Company, writes: "It is my desire to remember my old friend, William Paley, and herein take pleasure in enclosing the Nicholas Power Company's check for one hundred dollars, which I would thank you to place in the fund which, I believe, is being subscribed for his relief."

"The Gambler's Revenge"

Some Queer Turns of Luck Give Special Interest to a Well Thought-Out Picture.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE most important quality of any picture is its story; but the important quality of any story comes from its characters, whether we are attracted to them and can love them or not. Some writers draw characters with such compelling charm that every one likes them; but these writers are always the greatest geniuses—none are alive today so far as we know. The problem of chosing pictures or plays to entertain the public is, on account of human nature's unaccountable complexities, almost like chosing a wife for a friend; there's no safe rule to go by in either case. We need not carry the analogy too far. The saving element in chosing pictures or plays is that the characters in most of both have no very positive or individual peculiarities. One neither likes them positively nor dislikes them and, in that case, the story alone is important. One can judge stories much more safely, especially where he knows what his audiences have read or seen, have accepted or refused.



Scene from "The Gambler's Revenge" (Pasquali).

In this picture, which is in four parts, and which in outline follows a well recognized and acceptable formula, there are several new and quite freshly interesting incidents. Take the best of these: The poor hero who has suffered through the evil plotting of his sweetheart's uncle, has fallen into an exhausted sleep on a bench; his hat is lying beside him and into it is placed a talisman. If he knows how to use it when he wakes it will win a fortune for him. But he keeps on sleeping and it is stolen from him. He doesn't know anything about it; is neither richer nor poorer than when he fell asleep, yet the fortune was there and is gone. It happens that this incident is the turning point of the story and the good luck he seems to lose really is there; the talisman is no longer his, but is working for him. Added to these highly interesting points, the story keeps in the line of common sense and logic. Its author has taken time to do his work well; we find no places where we find him saying to himself, "This way out of my difficulty is not wholly believable, but it is the only way I can think of and is good enough for the public."

The public has been finding excellent acting in these Pasquali films and this offering exemplifies the thing that makes many people prefer pictures to plays, for in the pictures even in small roles and with a large cast, the players are more apt to go through their business with convincing humanity and be natural. This counts for a good deal. Also the photography, whether it shows moonlit waters or interiors, is artistic and pleasing. There was plainly no stint of money in the making of the sets. One hardly notices these in any picture, set by set, when they are natural; but the impression comes that we are familiar with the ins and outs of the hotel or the grounds around some dwelling. This helps to give continuity and naturalness to the story.

The picture tells a love story. Its opening situation shows that a banker, who has defrauded his partner and has been found out, must persuade his niece, the story's heroine, to break her engagement to a young man, the hero, who is secretary of the chief of police, and marry the defrauded partner or he must pay the penalty. The banker is unable to prevail by persuasion and uses craft. He learns that the young secretary has important documents in his pocket to copy at home. He steals and reseals the envelope, then he sends a letter addressed to the secretary at the police office, which he knows will be opened by the superior officers and words it so that it will make natural suspicion seem almost assurance. The youth is arrested and sent to prison, but the girl refuses to believe in his guilt.

The man escapes from the penitentiary. It is while he is sleeping by the wayside that the lucky coin is placed in his cap and stolen. It soon makes the man who steals it rich by gambling and he helps the poor man from whose cap he took it. Learning his story, he decides to help him prove his innocence. By a happy coincidence, the girl, too, meets them. She has run away from her uncle, who is drinking to drown the memories of his misdeeds. The three work up a successful plot to make the villain reveal his crime, and with the help of the police get a full confession from him. There is a happy ending.

THOMAS SANTSCHI.

Versatile Leading Man of the Selig Company—An Actor of Rare Ability.

THOMAS is not, in reality, Santschi's correct first name. It is Paul W. He is called Tom by his friends and Thomas by the Selig Polyscope Company's press agents and officials. The name of Tom has stuck to him ever since he appeared in his first moving picture for the Selig Company. This happened back in 1907 when he joined the Selig forces at their Chicago studios. The director under whom he was working had difficulty in remembering his name. For this reason he was dubbed "Tom," that being the name of the part he was playing at the time. He made good in this first picture and from then on Tom was in demand by the producers.

Thomas Santschi.

Santschi is one of the most interesting members of the Western branch of the Selig Polyscope Company. Big in physical development, taciturn in disposition and possessing a keen sense of humor, this popular leading man has won for himself a following so large that his adopted name is almost a byword among picture fans. Lucerne, Switzerland, the very name of which fills one with poetic fancies, was his birthplace. Early in life his soul developed the wanderlust and he turned toward the United States. St. Louis claimed Tom for its own, and here it was that he received his schooling. This completed, he turned his attention to the trade of watchmaker. Having a great love for music he spent many hours each day at the piano. Always possessed of an overpowering ambition for the stage, he spent his days at the jeweler's bench and his nights at the "show shops" doing extra work whenever opportunity afforded.

The inevitable soon happened. The jewelry business began to lose its hold on Tom and the boards claimed him. Theatrical experiences came fast and furious after that and Tom always made good. One day he walked into the Selig Polyscope studios and announced that he was ready for work. He was tried out and put into "leads." Here he remained until he became leading man of the Western company, of which he was an original member. He accompanied the first motion picture camera man into California and has remained in that fairyland ever since.

Tom has an unusual talent for music and plays almost entirely by "ear" and "inspiration," often improvising to the everlasting pleasure of his friends, who never tire of hearing him. Tom Santschi holds the reputation of having played more different roles than any other actor in the moving picture business. His dressing room diary, which is incomplete, shows that he has portrayed over 1,100 different parts during his five years as a picture player.

The Selig Company and Tom are inseparable and neither is anxious to lose the other.

"The Black Thirteen."

A Three-Part Apex Thriller.

THERE have been some pretty swiftly moving detective stories on the screen from time to time but it is doubtful whether the oldest inhabitant can remember a story of that type that dispenses with the wearisome formality of engaging the great detective. This picture is such a rapid-fire succession of shocks and shivers that there is no time to waste in preliminary consultations or microscopic examinations of invisible evidence. Thumb prints, anonymous letters, mysterious murders, Hindoo agents, knives of peculiar design, trap-doors and all the detective getting clap-trap of the usual detective drama were slipped into the discard by the producer of this picture. Such things were too slow for him.

The story at its very beginning tugs at the leash, like a bloodhound, eager to get away on the scent and track down the prey. No, there is no time for the aristocratic white haired banker to be ushered into the presence of Hayes, the great detecter, to state his case. There isn't any white-haired banker and there isn't any case. (Cries of "Well—what's it all about?")

Scene from "The Black Thirteen" (Apex).

Simply this: The great detective hires himself. All the incentive needed for him to get busy is the reading of a newspaper story that "The Black Thirteen" is at it again, and away goes the story like the aforesaid bloodhound let loose, and it never stops until the big three of the Black 13 are entirely hors du combat, not to say down and out. What becomes of the other ten is rather difficult to determine as they were never quite clearly identified at any time, but from the fate that overtook the big three we can imagine that their finish must have been equally nonplussing.

Hayes, the great detective, is sitting in his room like a fireman waiting the call of the gong. He chafes at his idleness. Some one hands him a paper and he reads that the old gang is on the job making counterfeit bills. That's enough. Why prolong the agony? He is off to the chase that never ends until the last foot of reel No. 3. And some chase it is; take it on the word of a visiting fireman. They crawl over the outsides of moving trains, jump off of bridges, boats, windmills, etc; part of the time they swim and part of the time they play hide and seek on a boulevard omnibus, but they can't lose Mr. Hayes.

In the early stages his faithful lieutenant, without previous orders, tips the detective off to the fact that he suspects the wealthy Miss Dennison, an heiress, of being in league with the gang. With this to work on, Hayes gets a job as butler to Miss D. who runs a swell gambling joint. How he got the job doesn't matter; this is a picture of action with no time to waste on red tape or routine matters. As Miss Dennison's butler, he finds out a lot of things, and is horrified to learn that the beautiful young lady is none other than the desperate leader of the gang, known as "Slim Jack" in her nocturnal masculine disguise. She being a millionairess and an heiress one would suppose that she does this sort of thing as a pastime, but she claims that her evil uncle and his nephew have some strange power over her. Hayes, however, is not to be duped by any such story.

It is really difficult to remember all the different dangers that Hayes got into, but through the bewildering maze of action comes the recollection of his being discovered once in an Apache den in Paris, and somebody turned off the lights. There is a remembrance of his being tied hand and foot in a burning windmill and of the mill being destroyed by dynamite. There were some cowboys, too, but just what they did lingers not in mind except that one of them was a watchman at a railroad crossing. We are not certain but we think Hayes also did some wading in a sewer.

Anyhow he rounded up the three principal members of the gang. Miss Dennison fell in love with Hayes in sheer admiration of his indefatigability, but she died from exposure, poor thing, on a prison cot, and Hayes was rewarded for his good work by her unsolicited dying kiss.

If any exhibitor is looking for a real "bing-bing" electric shock for his lethargic patrons we do not think he needs look further than this.

New Picture Making Company.

The Sid Olcott International Features Ready to Begin Work —Will Release Through Warner's.

SIDNEY OLCOTT has resigned as producer of the Gene Gauntier Feature Players and has organized the Sid Olcott International Features. Mr. Olcott will retain his interest in the former company. Jack J. Clark, who has had wide experience in picture making, having accompanied Mr. Olcott in his travels from Jacksonville to Jerusalem, will succeed to the management of the Gauntier Players.

Mr. Olcott is the pioneer away-from-home picture man. He it was who took the first company from the shelter of a studio—a Kalem aggregation to Jacksonville, Fla. In August, 1910, he bettered this record by sailing for the other side of the water, making pictures in Ireland, England, Germany and France. The venture was a marked success, artistically and otherwise. In 1911 he took another company to Ireland. In December of that year, after two months at home, he went to Jacksonville. Just as he got into the season's work—he had been off the steamer but ten days—he received a telegram from Mr. Marion instructing him to make preparations for an immediate trip abroad. In twenty-four hours the party was on its way to New York, whence it sailed for the Mediterranean. Pictures were taken in New York Harbor, on the Island of Madeira, in Spain and in Gibraltar, Algiers, Genoa, Naples, Rome, Alexandria, Cairo, Luxor, Port Said, and Jerusalem. In the latter city and its vicinity Mr. Olcott produced "From the Manger to the Cross," a Kinematographic triumph. On the way back from the Holy Land pictures were made in the British Isles. When Mr. Olcott returned to the United States, in October, he organized the Gene Gauntier Feature Players, in conjunction with Miss Gauntier and Jack J. Clark. The company spent the winter in Jacksonville and in the summer made another trip to Ireland, where some excellent pictures were made.

In talking with a World man, Mr. Olcott said he intended making just what the name of his organization indicated—international features. His first destination, however, would be Jacksonville, for which city he intended to sail on January 3, taking with him a company of fourteen. His product will be three-reel subjects mainly, although it is his intention to make at least one or two really big pictures each season. A host of friends in the trade and out of it will wish Mr. Olcott success; and if past performances may be considered a criterion he will win it.

The Sid Olcott International Features will be released through Warner's Features.

"POP" ROCK IS SIXTY—GOES LIKE FORTY.

On Tuesday, December 30, 1913, "Pop" Rock moved the peg up to the sixty hole on the "cribbage board of time" and, believe us or not, as you like, he has a gait like forty. Maybe it is because he is in the motion picture business and that life and its responsibilities have not rested heavily on his mind; maybe it is that he has discovered the spring of eternal youth and that his heart is still young, but whatever may be the reason, the fact is apparent that he is yet a vigorous man of affairs, alert and keen of mind and understanding. Taken all in all, he is the youngest old man in the picture business. Here's to his continued good health and happiness.

UNIVERSAL EXTENDS GREETINGS TO RIVAL EXCHANGES.

The good-will the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, with Carl Laemmle as its president, feels toward all, even their rivals in business, was exemplified in the sending out on Christmas day of a hundred and seventy-two telegrams to their own and various General Film Company and Mutual Exchanges. The telegram reads as follows:

"On behalf of the entire Universal organization, I extend cordial Christmas greetings and best wishes for the happiest of New Years to yourself and yours." Universal Film Manufacturing Company, Carl Laemmle, President.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THROUGH THE STORM" (Essanay).

Expense and time were not spared in the production of "Through the Storm." For several days the Essanay Company had the use of two trains, locomotives, the good will, and the help of a Western railroad. "Through the Storm" is a drama of railroad and telegraph life, in which a lineman, prompted by his duty to the company he is employed with, struggles to save the fast mail from utter destruction. Three members of a "yegg" gang plan to blow up bridge number 17 and wrech the oncoming fast mail. The lineman (Francis X. Bushman), overhears the plot and is rewarded by being knocked unconscious by the trio. Regaining his senses, he manages to pull himself to the nearest telegraph pole, where almost in a state of collapse, he climbs the pole, cuts the wires and informs the nearest telegraph station of the scheme. The police and deputies arrive at the bridge and secret themselves behind the iron structure. The men are captured. The lineman's wife (Beverly Bayne), had applied to the superintendent of the telegraph department, for an appointment as telegraph operator at Daly's Creek, and was informed that the railroad company had no intention whatsoever of putting in communication at that point.

Scene from "Through the Storm" (Essanay).

The officials of the railroad reward Andy by appointing his wife telegraph operator at Daly's Creek, and by making him chief lineman of that division. The photography and the storm that prevails throughout the entire first reel make the picture realistic. The portrayal of characters has been well handled. This production is booked for release Friday, January 23rd.

HOSPITAL AT UNIVERSAL HOLLYWOOD STUDIOS.

An emergency hospital has been established at the Hollywood (Cal.) studios of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. Although the company maintains a fully equipped hospital at its ranch in the San Fernando valley, the Hollywood studios are seven miles distant and immediate aid to the injured is often required. Dr. Lloyd Mace, a practicing physician and well known as an actor, has been placed in charge of the hospital at the Hollywood Studios.

NEWSPAPER MAN FOR PATHE'S WEEKLY.

William P. Helm, Jr., formerly with the Associated Press and before that city editor of the Newark, N. J., Star, has been made editor of Pathe's Weekly. Mr. Helm's many friends in the newspaper business are rooting for his success.

"THE LOAFER" (Reliance).

George Siegman probably never did a more artistic piece of work than his latest characterization of the name part in "The Loafer," to be released on January 7, and this, in spite of the fact that it is one of the most difficult roles that he has been called upon to interpret.

Mark S. Reardon is the author of the story which deals with an intensely interesting epoch in the life of a typical small town ne'er-do-well. Love for his old mother, which, although it is not strong enough to make him work for her, finally leads to his reformation, and prevents him from committing a crime, is the dominant note of the drama.

A doctor, who takes an interest in the boy's mother, remonstrates with him before a crowd of his worthless associates and is forced to give him a thrashing. He resents the doctor's interference to such an extent that he is easily persuaded by his companions to "get even" and is about to be revenged when he becomes the unwilling witness of a scene between the doctor and his mother which works the miracle that makes him a new man and a useful citizen of the community.

With Irene Hunt as the "Loafer's" sister, Jessie Villares as his mother, and Sue Balfour and Garfield Thompson prominent in the excellently balanced cast, "The Loafer" is an artistic offering of more than passing interest to the lovers of strong, heart interest drama.

FOX STARTS FEATURE EXCHANGE.

William Fox, owner of the Fox Circuit, has formed a feature exchange which will be known as the Box Office Attraction Film Rental Company. Contracts have been signed for exclusive exhibiting rights in New York City and State and New England on the feature products of Solax, Blache, American, Film Releases of America, Ramo, Eclectic, Great Northern Special Features, and Great Northern Preferred Features. In addition to a rental business the new company will also exhibit and sell the feature product of three European manufacturers whose photoplays are not being shown in America. A generous stock of lithographs for each feature will be carried.

"THE MARRIAGE OF FIGARO" (Ambrosio).

"The Marriage of Figaro" is an Ambrosio two-reel subject which Mr. Kleine schedules for release through the General Film Company as a regular two-reel release, Tuesday, February 3, 1914. This subject was selected by Mr. Kleine personally while in Europe and is notable for some of the most magnificent settings available in Seville, Spain, where the drama was staged. Several leads of this production are the same whose work in Kleine's "The Last Days of Pompeii" has created so much favorable comment the world over.

"THE INSPECTOR'S STORY" (Lubin).

This is one of the most beautiful and pathetic stories ever told and a tribute to the officers of the law, who are too often supposed to be heartless. The inspector of the tale is one of God's men, a lovely character and an honor to the force whose duty it is to protect the peace. The picture is admirably cast and will do much to add appreciation of the Lubin pathetic photoplays. Clay M. Greene is the author.

Jim Sloane, an ironworker, who has lost his job through intemperate habits, leaves his wife in a dying condition and continues his spree. His wife is dying and sends her little daughter of eight years to find her father that she may take a last farewell. The child passing a saloon hears a shot fired and entering finds that her father has killed a man and is under arrest. The child induces the inspector to take her father to the bedside of the mother to say goodbye forever. Jim receives a life sentence and the inspector, taking a deep interest in the child, assists her in conducting a newspaper route and instructs his men to protect her. One day the child asks the inspector how pardons are secured, he points to a lady in a carriage and tells Nelly that, that lady is the governor's wife. The child's story interests the lady and a pardon is secured and with the inspector's aid the father and child are installed as owners of a profitable newsstand.

"WITHERED HANDS" (Powers).

"Withered Hands," which has just been produced at the Pacific Coast studios of the Universal by Edwin August, has a romance of real life behind it. Mr. August met by accident and came to admire an elderly lady, Mrs. May Bensen. She reminded him of his mother and, he says, he saw in her all the noble, fine things a man might see in an elderly woman.

He was so impressed with her that he wrote a story around her and invited her to play the part of his mother in it. She accepted and "Withered Hands" is the result.

It is the story of a kindly old mother and her son. He leaves her in answer to the call of the great city. In after years he is drifting along the wrong path. His mind reverts to his old mother and the loving touch of her withered hands when he left her. He reforms and returns to her. The human interest element in the story is strong and offers a subject for deep reverie.

NEW FEATURE EXCHANGE IN CANADA.

The Independent Feature Film Company has opened offices at 10 Victoria Street, Montreal, and will handle a line of feature films throughout the Dominion of Canada. Mr. M. Kashin is general manager. He has been an exhibitor for five or six years, and is thoroughly posted in regard to the requirements of Canadian audiences. He has been in New York for several days selecting films, and has already secured "The Girl of the Sunny South" in five reels, and "Over Niagara Falls" in four reels. Except for the confusion and annoyance resulting from the activities of the various Censor Boards in Canada, the Canadian exhibitors are enjoying good business as a rule, and the number of houses throughout Canada is increasing every month.

EARL BRUNSWIG.

The accompanying photograph is that of Earl Brunswig, who, until recently, toured the country with his brother, Victor, in a highly successful singing act. Until the death of the younger brother about six weeks ago, the well-known Brunswig Brothers' act went big and was booked solid for whole seasons at a time. Without his brother for a partner, Earl Brunswig has found it a difficult problem to locate a suitable teammate, and until such time as he can get in touch with a good tenor, he is anxious to work along other lines, and is open for a proposition as theater manager, photoplay actor or singer. He will travel to any part of the United States, offering proper inducements, and will furnish interested parties with the best of references. As a theater manager, Mr. Brunswig has had the necessary experience, having owned and operated his own house in partnership with his brother.

Earl Brunswig.

DAY AND NIGHT SCREEN CREATES INTEREST.

The fine new Plaza Theater in New Orleans has just recently opened and General Manager Gueringer is highly enthusiastic over the results obtained from the installation of the Day and Night Screen. He is expecting to install another in a house now under construction by the same company. This screen was also used at a recent demonstration at the Hotel Astor of the Barker film, "Sixty Years a Queen." Messrs. Barker & Laurilard use sixteen of these screens in England, and insisted on showing their film on the same projection surface in this country, as they are thoroughly familiar with its result-producing and current-saving qualities.

"A THIEF OF HEARTS" (Patheplay).

Pathe Freres announce the release on Thursday, January 15th, of a two part drama, the scenes of which are laid both in France and Spain. An automobile trip through the Pyrenees and a stirring bull fight in Spain are two of the things that make this offering unusual.

The story tells of Pierre de Brezeux, a man at heart worthy and good and engaged to an estimable lady of superior qualifications, but who becomes enmeshed in the toils of a shallow and tempestuous dancer. She gets him even more strongly hooked by playing upon his jealousy, using, for the purpose, a Spanish matador.

The Spaniard becomes deeply in love with her and eventually begins to really arouse her love in return. Through the forgetfulness of Pierre, a letter from the matador to the dancer fails to reach her and through misunderstanding the matador throws himself on the horns of the bull in the arena. His death reveals Ida's feelings and in a passionate quarrel they part forever. Fine acting, fine scenery, and stirring scenes make this a good offering.

"GOOD PALS" (Patheplay).

Pathe Freres will release on Saturday, January 17th, a two part drama featuring little Miss Risser and a very intelligent dog. Between the two they keep up interest to the very end and make a really unusual offering. The story is built around the treacherous and jealous nature of a woman cousin of John Kane whom he has taken into his house out of the kindness of his heart. The money which she obtains she hoards as a miser and, outwardly pleasant, hates the Kanes because they have more money than she.

Scene from "Good Pals" (Patheplay).

The father, John Kane, is called west on business and leaves Beatrice in charge of the cousin to whom he gives plenty of money to insure funds and comfort while he is gone. His cousin adds the money to her private hoard without compunction. Kane meets with an injury in an encounter with bears and is reported dead. Through a strange combination of circumstances a large sum of money in his possession is stolen from him but later reaches his cousin Jane as the legal guardian of the child. Jane now gives vent to her hatred and, driving Beatrice to the garret, tells her that her father has died penniless and that she is now a beggar. The abused child finds her only comfort in Shep, the faithful dog who is her constant companion. How Kane finally returns to set things right is one of the interesting parts of a very interesting story.

"BETWEEN TWO FIRES" (Lubin).

A very dramatic story of hearts and arms, love and war, not the first or only time that a beautiful girl of the North loved a brave soldier of the South, and did heroic deeds to save the life of the man of her heart. The picture is true to the atmosphere of the period and quaint in costumes of the time. The cast is one of the best that the Lubin home company can furnish.

"DESTINIES FULFILLED" (American).

The first three reel "Flying A" production will be released on January 12th, 1914. It was produced by Lorimer Johnston to whom is due much credit for this splendid dramatization of an all-absorbing topic. It is a sidelight of the Civil War although no attempt has been made to put on a war drama.

Scene from "Destinies Fulfilled" (American).

The leads are played by Vivian Rich, Sydney Ayres, Jack Richardson and Jacques Jaccard.

The interest is maintained throughout the production and the quiet and natural sequence of events attest ability of highest calibre on the part of the entire staff. The soft tones and delightful tints are pleasing to the eye and emphasize the artistic merit and excellent photographic quality that prevails throughout.

"BY WHOSE HAND" (Great Northern).

If ever circumstantial evidence seemed to convict an innocent man it is in the Great Northern special feature "By Whose Hand," when the coils of fate gather round the neck of Robert, son of the commissioner of police. Old Rubin, the pawnbroker, to whom young Robert had been known to have held grievance, had come to his death by a gun-shot wound. It was natural to believe that Robert's finger had pulled the trigger and the clever district-attorney had no trouble in establishing a strong case against the suspected youth.

Not before the last few feet of film in the third and last reel is the truth revealed, the interest and baffling perplexity being sustained most skilfully. All the way through the film, feeling certain of the innocence of the hero, one looks for the secret enemy who had so successfully kept himself in the dark while the law hounds searched vigilantly. Imagine the surprise and the admiration for the adroitness and cleverness of the conception when it is proved that no human agency discharged the gun—that God's sunlight was the murderer.

HENDRICK I. DAVENPORT DEAD.

Hendrick I. Davenport, of Watertown, Wis., known to the motion picture industry as "H. Davis," president of the Davis Film Exchange, died at his home on December 24, 1913, of heart failure. The deceased was fifty-five years of age, and is survived by his wife, an adopted son and four brothers. Mr. Davenport was one of the pioneers of the moving picture business. He leaves a large fortune to his heirs. The Davis Film Exchange is an incorporated company and will continue business. William Davenport becomes president and Robert N. Davenport, secretary.

"PRINCESS ELENA'S PRISONER" (Gt. Northern).

"Princess Elena's Prisoner," the first of the Great Northern Film Company's series to be released as "Preferred Feature Attractions," is attracting widespread attention among the trade and the exhibitors as well. The plot was reviewed at length in these columns and it will be recalled that Miss Betty Nansen, the distinguished tragedienne of Scandinavia, was praised without stint for her splendid impersonation of the role of the Princess Elena.

The photodrama, which is in four parts, is now being released by the Great Northern Company as one of its preferred feature attractions and this will be followed by Miss Nansen in the role of Muriel Yorke in the four reel drama, "A Paradise Lost," which is said to contain all the elements that go to make an appealing and thrilling film production. These productions are to be released through the Great Northern Film Company, 110 West 40th Street.

CONVICTS SEE GEORGE KLEINE'S "POMPEII."

The above flashlight shows convicts in the Boise, Idaho State Penitentiary, watching a production of George Kleine's "The Last Days of Pompeii." This was the first occasion on which many of the convicts who have spent twenty or more years in jail ever witnessed a motion picture. The governor, secretary of state, mayor of Boise, and newspaper men were present. The experiment proved so successful that others will follow.

SPECIAL MUSIC FOR "ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA."

George Kleine has assigned a well known Chicago composer to the task of preparing appropriate music for "Antony and Cleopatra." This will consist of a fifty page lithographed book of original music. While the innovation has been expensive in a financial way, the results have more than justified expectations.

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

MARGUERITE SNOW and James Cruze, of Thanhouser, are back in picture teamwork again. Since "She," this pair has been noted in important parts in Thanhouser films. For the past six months Mr. Cruze has been working alone because three years' consecutive Thanhouser work made Miss Snow seek a rest.

Eleanor Woodruff, Pathe leading woman, spent Christmas at her home in Towanda, Pa. Her return for the holiday having been announced, a local playhouse gave her a compliment by announcing a "Miss Woodruff program," so that her friends might see her on the screen.

Tom Mix, the champion all-around cowboy, daring rider and dare-devil deviser of thrilling moving picture stunts, has stopped risking his life for a fortnight in the wilds of Arizona, to visit the Selig plant at Chicago. Some one offered Tom seats to the Grand Opera. "Opera be hanged," said the great classicist from the Wild West. "What I want to see is some real vaudeville."

In an article extolling the gorgeous beauties of nature found prevalent in Santa Barbara, Cal., to appear in Harper's Bazar, Miss Vivian Rich, of the "Flying A" players, was asked to pose. The personal charm and beauty of Miss Rich will add considerably to the interest and attractiveness of the picturesque illustrations.

Herbert Lubin, representing the International Feature Film Corporation, Ltd., of Montreal, Canada, has completed arrangements with the Film Releases of America to handle their feature output in Canada, beginning with the three-reel subject, "Outlawed."

Philip A. Holman, who has been with the Pilot Films Corporation since its inception, as publicity manager and scenario editor, recently severed his connections with that company, and is now a "booster" of Sterling films.

George Terwilliger as the author, and Lottie Briscoe and Arthur Johnson as the co-stars, have the proud knowledge that their joint work in the "District Attorney's Conscience" and "The Parasites" resulted in the two most successful films, both from an artistic and a monetary point of view, ever released by the Lubin Company.

One of the features of the current Universal Animated Weekly release is the posing of Mrs. Frederick W. Vanderbilt when she presented recently in New York, for the New York Women's League for Animals, a handsome reward to the best mounted policeman after a competition held on Harlem River Speedway.

Phil Gleichman, general manager of the World Special Films Corporation, was given an agreeable surprise on Christmas, when the employees of the Detroit branch presented him with a cut-glass punch bowl and glasses.

Signor Conti, Italian consul stationed at Milwaukee, Wis., recently witnessed a performance of "Quo Vadis?". The signor recognized in some of the scenes the villa Pia and the villa Pedrosa. "I marvel," said Conti, after the show, "at the influence that was brought to bear on the King of Italy to permit pictures to be taken in these villas as they have been closed since 1871, during which time no one has been allowed to enter the gates. Even the shutters have been tightly closed and fastened."

Essie Fay, one of the most successful women in the United States in handling lions, tigers and other ferocious animals, and engaged by the Universal Company to act in the big animal pictures to be produced at the Pacific Coast studios of the Universal by Otis Turner and Francis Ford, has arrived on the coast.

Every time he lands on Broadway, Watterson R. Rothacker, the hustling general manager of the Industrial Moving Picture Company of Chicago, has some new enterprise to unfold. Last week, he came to New York to film the famous terpsichorean artists, Mr. and Mrs. Vernon Castle, who are teaching the tango to the Four Hundred.

A private exhibition of George Kleine's great Kleine-Cines subject, "Antony and Cleopatra," was given for the benefit of Chicago theatrical managers last week. All of the big Chicago downtown theaters were represented. The picture is creating much talk in legitimate theatrical circles. Managers are speculating on its probable effect on "legit" circuits.

Johnny Langmack, the ambidexterous and peripatetic property man of the Selig Polyscope Company, is back in Chicago from a busy pilgrimage in California, with a touch of rheumatism and many memories, exciting and otherwise, born of experiences in jumping over the six miles of territory intervening between the Selig studios at Edendale and the Selig Zoo at Eastlake Park, Los Angeles.

George Fitzmaurice, head of the Pathe scenario department, had a narrow escape from serious injury on Christmas night. A taxi in which he was riding skidded on the slippery asphalt on Fifth Avenue, New York, and collided with the curb. Mr. Fitzmaurice had his head driven through the window and was badly cut up by the broken glass.

CORRESPONDENCE

MISSOURI.

THE holidays proved fruitful for moving picture men of Kansas City as well as for those in other lines of business. The streets were thronged until late at night and the animated picture theaters reaped a goodly share of the harvest. Little decrease in business was reported from the numerous houses in the residential districts and taken as a whole, Christmas was a distinct benefit to Kansas City exhibitors.

The Roof Garden, is the alluring title of a new theater opened at Chanute, Kans., recently. The Roof Garden is an upstairs house, and will show both vaudeville and moving pictures. Bateman & Leamon are the owners of the new house, which has a seating capacity of about 700.

Joseph Steiner, owner of the Merit Theater, Thirty-first and Main streets, has obtained good results by issuing a program, showing the events to be staged during the next week. The program is printed on Saturday, giving a complete list of the films which will be seen during the following seven days. The Colonial Theater is another which is now issuing a program. None of the uptown houses have yet adopted this plan, which involves quite an expenditure.

With exhibitors of Kansas City enjoying plenty of turkey and other trimmings for their Christmas dinner, a good many contributed to the "Raggedy Stocking Fund," which went to make Christmas a happy one for the youngsters who lacked the advantages of others. Haid & Brandner, of the Highland Theater, the Electric Theater, of Kansas City, Kans.; John Donnelly, owner of the American Theater, and many others, contributed the receipts of special performances to the fund. The Tinker-Nichols Theater was another which donated. The house, located at Fifteenth and Prospect, is owned by Joe Tinker, erstwhile manager of the Cincinnati National League ball club, and "Kid" Nichols, whose exploits on the diamond are well known to the fans of the older generation. Tinker is said to have wired his partner from Chicago, as soon as he learneds of the plans of the exhibitors, instructing Nichols to get into the game.

A lawsuit, in which the Universal exchange and the Morgan Film Exchange in Kansas City were involved, has been settled out of court. By the agreement, the Universal comes into possession of 2,222 films formerly owned by the Morgan Film Exchange. J. W. Morgan, head of the concern, announced that he would re-enter the film business early in the new year. He will install a new stock of films and supplies, according to present plans. M. E. Williams, formerly with the Morgan Film Exchange, with which he spent ten years, is now with the Universal, and will have charge of several states, working under the district manager.

Kansas City will boast of some of the highest-grade houses in the country if present prospects are carried out. Two new moving picture theaters are to be opened early in January, boasting an aggregate seating capacity of 3,500. One of the new houses is located at Thirty-first and Cherry streets. It is owned by W. L. Rhodes, and is capable of accommodating 2,000 patrons. The Burkey Brothers will shortly throw open their splendid new house at Seventeenth and Sunset. It will seat 1,500. It compares well with the handsomest in the country, it is believed, as far as appearance is concerned, and has a modern ventilation system, by which the air is changed every minute.

An ordinance has been passed in Kansas City, Kans., providing that owners of motion picture theaters must provide seats for all patrons. No standing will be allowed. There are no so-called legitimate theaters in Kansas City, Kans., and the animated picture houses are highly popular. The new ordinance will cut heavily into the receipts of exhibitors it is feared, and there is a good deal of indignation over its passage. Whether it will be carried higher has not yet been decided.

F. W. Cunningham, of the Welfare Board in Kansas City, showed an odd film to friends recently. The film contains 450 feet, and is growing steadily. Mr. Cunningham's duties are to censor all pictures shown in Kansas City, which have not been passed by the National board. He has cut out what he considers objectionable features in many such films, and has made the parts into one. The effect is rather startling, as there is neither plot nor moral. Most of the scenes contain bloodshed, and Mr. Cunningham's picture is not likely to bring a high price from any exhibitor.

Ernest F. Jores, formerly connected with a Kansas City church, but more recently prominent as organist in the Twelfth-street Theater, operated by the Standard Amusement Company, has left Kansas City. His return is considered improbable. Mr. Jores is a genius of the first water when it comes to playing an organ, and officers of the company filled the vacancy created by his departure with a good deal of reluctance.

Kinemacolor has made its appearance in Kansas City, the Globe Theater showing it in conjunction with vaudeville. The newspapers gave the arrival of Kinemacolor a good deal of attention.

Motion pictures were conspicuous at the recent exhibition of the Missouri Poultry Association, held at Convention Hall, Kansas City. Prof. T. C. Quisenberry, head of the Mountain Grove experiment station, is the owner of the film, which he displayed to instruct members in the most approved methods of raising poultry.

"Les Miserables," Victor Hugo's great drama, was shown by a Kansas City church recently, the Grand Avenue Temple staging the multiple-reel feature. The event was well advertised and attracted good crowds, even at the admission prices of 25 and 50 cents asked by the church folk.

Pupils of the Morse school, in Kansas City, recently purchased a moving picture machine. It will be used both for educational work and for giving performances at night. W. H. Martin, principal of the school, is taking lessons in projection, and will have charge of the operating booth.

The management of the Apollo Theater, 3225 Troost avenue, has decided to allow parents in that residential section to do the choosing of the program one night weekly. The pictures shown on the designated nights will be largely educational, and there is some doubt as to whether the receipts at the box office will be able to stand the strain. Other exhibitors have been asked to follow suit, but have not shown much enthusiasm about giving up the management of their own houses.

M. B. Faidley, of Kansas City, had a close shave recently while taking moving pictures of an auto-polo game at Topeka, Kans. Auto-polo is the latest craze in sporting circles at the Kansas capital. Grady Montgomery, owner of the Iris Theater, had Mr. Faidley photograph the game. The only trouble was that the auto drivers were a little too careless for comfort, and Mr. Faidley was deeply pleased when he had accomplished the feat without losing an arm or two.

The Iris Theater, of Topeka, Kans., is now running Kinemacolor. A new Simplex machine is being used in connection with the pictures in natural color. Advertisements run by the Iris referred to Kinemacolor as the "eighth wonder of the world," and Topeka residents have turned out liberally for the new attraction.

MURRAY.

LOUISVILLE.

THE use of motion pictures for industrial purposes, both as a means of advertising and selling the goods and for educational work among the public, sometimes with the view of creating favorable sentiment toward an industry, is increasing daily. The Paper Makers' Company, a paper concern with offices in Louisville, will have a number of reels made in and around paper mills, showing the various processes used, and will probably be able to have them shown as a part of regular programs, as they will contain no special advertising matter. A dispatch from New Orleans, La., states that pictures taken at Gulfport, Miss., showing the handling of lumber for export, made a hit with the audiences at various photoplay houses recently, this picture being a Pathe Freres production. Other instances are available in various parts of the country, indicating the growing appreciation of the film as a useful method of reproducing, for any purpose desired, business and industrial processes.

The Owl Film Company, one of the newer exchanges in Louisville, will shortly move into larger quarters on the ground floor at 415 West Green Street, where a complete repair department will be added to the company's equipment. Machines and accessories of all kinds will be repaired in this department, which is expected to fill a long-felt want, as such work has formerly been done only incidentally to the handling of equipment. The company has recently purchased twelve new three-reel features, some of which have been released already. Business has been brisk, twelve outfits having been sold during the past week.

J. G. Givliden, of Sulphur, Ky., will open a motion picture theater in that town about January 10. He is now making preparations for his initial performance, arranging his program, etc. He purchased his machine and other equipment from the Owl Film Company, of Louisville.

James Hankins, of Louisville, will shortly open a colored photoplay house at Jackson Street and Roselane, and has about completed the purchase of his equipment for that purpose.

Hopkins Theater, which is running successfully as a motion picture house, after a long career in vaudeville and stock, has secured the first run of the Mutual program in Louisville.

The Kerrigan Theater, of New Albany, Ind., has a press agent who is never at a loss for a new stunt to draw the crowds and boost business for the house. One of the latest devices of this genius, as well as one of the most successful, was the employment of a tight-rope performer, who stretched his airy highway across the street directly in front of the theater and proceeded to demonstrate his skill. Half the town, as a matter of course, turned out to see the free show from time to time, and not a few of them went into the Kerrigan when the tight-rope man had got through with his program.

A two-reel Victor film, featuring Florence Lawrence in "The Girl and Her Money," headed the program at the Novelty the early part of last week, meeting with the success usual with productions in which Miss Lawrence stars. "The Jew's Christmas," a Rex three-reel drama, was a great drawing card last Sunday, which is always a big day with the Novelty.

Edward Wentzell, manager of the Norman Theater at Twenty-first and Portland Avenue, had the misfortune to lose his little daughter last week. The funeral was held on Monday, December 22, and the theater was closed on Saturday, Sunday and Monday out of respect for Mr. Wentzell's loss.

One of the first of the new Gold Seal releases on the Universal program, "From Rail Splitter to President," was a pronounced hit with Louisville audiences last week, each of the houses handling it in turn finding this to be the case.

The Werger Company, of Louisville, has been successful in obtaining the lease of the People's Theater, of Owensboro, Ky., the property of the People's Amusement Company. The house was desired by the McDonald Amusement Company, controlling a string of playhouses in Knoxville, Memphis, Nashville and Chattanooga, Tenn., but the Louisville concern won out. M. E. Mattingly, of Louisville, will be manager of the house, which has been closed for a number of months. Mr. Mattingly announces that he will make a number of improvements, and will open the house shortly with a fine program of vaudeville and motion pictures.

Manager J. C. Taylor, of the Gem Theater, Frankfort, Ky., recently opened the new house, which responded with capacity audiences. The house has a seating capacity of 300, measuring 18 by 100 feet in the clear. It was erected several doors from the old Gem, which was destroyed by fire last August.

Malcolm Welsinger, owner of the Colonial Theater, of Danville, Ky., is making arrangements to enlarge the house, by moving the stage back twenty or thirty feet, so as to give room for about 150 more seats.

The contracts for the erection of the Lyric Theater and the Masonic Temple, in Carlisle, Ky., have been awarded to Elliott Colliver, a contractor of that place.

Morris Boultinghouse, who has been operating two motion picture houses in Grayville, Ill., for the past year, recently disposed of the Majestic Theater, one of his houses, to Sam Horton, who will continue its operation. Mr. Boultinghouse retains the ownership of the Electric Theater, but it is understood that he will shortly move to some other point to open a theater, having in mind particularly Marion, Ky., where he has about closed arrangements for a location.

Charles Mize, owner of the new Dixie photoplay house, in Somerset, Ky., opened the new theater recently with immediate success, large audiences attending the opening and subsequent performances. It is reported that another house will be opened in Somerset by Newton Brothers.

Manager Ward, of the Princess Theater, the newest and handsomest of the motion picture houses in Henderson, Ky., recently took a unique method of finding out whether a Sunday show would be acceptable to Henderson people. He simply asked them, and found the vote about twenty to one in favor of the Sunday show. The house was accordingly thrown open last Sunday with a five-reel program—a three-reel Gaumont feature, "Fantomas," and a two-reel Gaumont, "In the Claws of the Leopard."

James Hayes, a well-known coal dealer at Zion, in Henderson County, Ky., has recently purchased a half interest in the Princess Theater, at Madisonville, Ky., from Stanley Spoehr, and will move to that place in order to assist Manager Taliaferro in the management of the house. Mr. Spoehr sold because his interests in Henderson demanded his attention.

In addition to three good reels of motion pictures, the Star Theater, in Paducah, Ky., will hereafter offer a vaudeville program. Three turns will be offered, making a good-sized program for a ten-cent admission.

The Princess, a new $65,000 house at Meridian, Miss., managed by Sol Sugermann, was opened recently with immediate success. The house is one of the largest and handsomest in that part of the country.

Making the twelfth in the Fitchenburg string of photoplay houses in the South, the Plaza was thrown open to the public in New Orleans last week. A Bartola orchestra and an organ will be used to furnish music.

Joseph Bianchi, inventor of the Bianchi camera, is making arrangements to open a new house in Mobile, Ala. No details are available at this time as to size or cost, but it is understood that the new house will be one of the largest and finest in the city.

E. K. Lyon and Dennis O'Reilly, proprietors of motion picture houses in Frankfort, Ky., were the first victims of a crusade started recently by a new member of the city council against Sunday shows. The councilman took the ground that the licenses issued contemplated the operation of the theaters only six days a week, but the exhibitors thought otherwise, and the arrests followed. The two exhibitors named were each fined $25 and costs in the police court, but appealed at once, and will fight the matter out in the courts, in order to find out just where they stand on the question.

Are You Being Cheated?

Our Ticket Chopper is the Best Protection in the World. In Fact, It's a Necessity Wherever Tickets Are Sold DISHONEST Ticket Sellers and Ticket Takers HAVE NO CHANCE when our chopper is used, as all tickets dropped into it are cancelled or cut up by a turn of the side wheel, so that they cannot be sold again. Tickets, however, are not mutilated so badly that the numbers cannot be read.

The Chopper is a protection also to honest ticket men. It removes temptation. Equipped with a foot lever instead of wheel if desired.

In construction, the mechanism is simple, strong and accurate. The chopping rollers are of best tool steel, die-cut, and never fail to work properly.

This chopper will permit the door-keeper to handle fully fifty per cent. more patrons than is possible with the old system of taking by hand.

Finish. Cabinet is of finest golden quartered oak, mission or mahogany, highly polished, and trimmings are of metal, finished in colored enamel, baked by special process, which retains its brilliancy, or, if desired, all metal parts heavily nickel plated. Glass is best polished French plate, quarter inch thick. Size: 46 x 12 x 12 inches. Weight (boxed) 150 lbs.

PRICE: Chopper $50. Foot Lever (extra) $10. Nickel Trimmings (extra) $5.

A COMPLIMENT TO

Simplex

In speaking of our factory recently, a new employee remarked:

"Why, they have no repair department!"

No better testimonial could be desired; and it is true. Repairs are almost unknown.

New Orleans, La., Jan. 9, '13.

 * * I wish to advise that the two machines we have in our Alamo Theatre are now sixteen months old and are just as good as the day we put them in.*

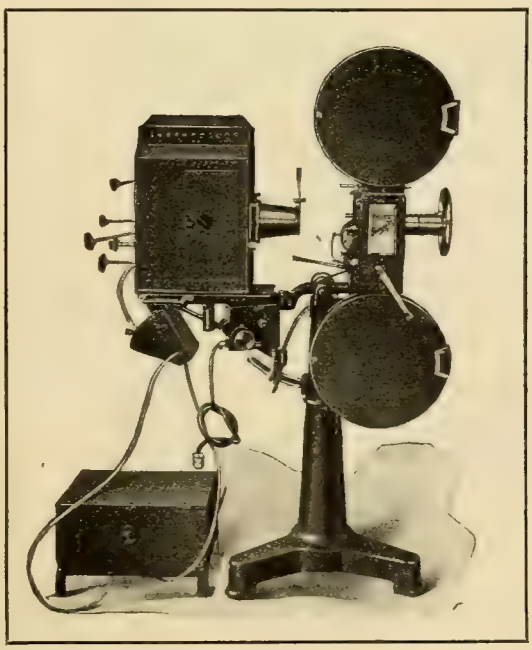
Very truly yours,
HERMAN H. FICHTENBERG.

Ft. Worth, Tex., Sept. 30, '13.

Gentlemen:

My machines are in fine condition, having been run for three years with practically no repairs.

Yours very truly,
C. M. Fox.



What About YOUR Upkeep?

It isn't the initial cost, but the maintenance expense that counts. Precision projection, solidity and great durability are features of

Danger

Booking a bad "big" feature means a great deal more to you than disappointing an audience. It means KILLING OFF THE MOTION PICTURE FANS.

A long feature is your whole show. If it is dull and stupid your patrons lose their enthusiasm for all motion picture entertainment. That is the danger of the horde of clap-trap "big features" with which the market is flooded today. And it is a real danger to you and to the film industry in general.

To steer clear you have simply to make use of the same reasoning that is followed by all successful merchants. If the demand for a certain article is so big that a merchant must lay in a heavy stock, he buys that stock from a manufacturer who has a reputation in the trade. He knows that if he does not meet the demand with reliable merchandise the demand will stop, and his money will be sunk in a stock that can't be sold. The same rule applies to every one who must ask for public support.

In YOUR line remember that a big feature is the highest development of the motion picture art. Its making requires all the skill of proven experts working with studios and equipments that have been developed to a point of perfection by long experience and costly experiments.

It would be fatal folly for the General Film Company to offer a big feature that would not be a credit to its unmatched reputation—excellent and reliable. You cannot afford to show any other kind of features in your house. There is no danger in honest merchandise.

Safety

Just Released

The Third Degree

Chas. Klein's drama founded on the inside workings of a great police department. This play ran a whole season in a Broadway playhouse and did a record business in first class theatres in every big city in America. The story is thrilling and intense while its appeal is so broad and general that it hits all classes of young and old, high-brow and low-brow—of picture fans. It is in 5 Reels, and is a fine example of Lubin's justly famous photographic production.

To be Released in January

Thor, Lord of the Jungle

A three reel story of love and adventure in the African Jungle. The astounding wild animal working in this Selig masterpiece will cause a sensation and arouse an enthusiasm that will be appreciated in the box office for weeks after its film is shown.

The Battle of Shiloh

A Lubin 4 Reel picture drama of war and sacrifice, superbly executed. A thrill and a throb in every scene. Made on the ground and in the original settings of Generals Grant and Johnston's awful conflict. A feature of intense interest, inspiring and instructive.

IN THREE REELS

THE BELLS OF DEATH

Our Two-Reel Weekly Releases

Jan. 3rd SATAN'S CASTLE

A wicked gambler having made a bargain with Satan, spends his days and nights in wild revels, exerting his evil power for miles around. His cruel sovereignty comes to an unexpected end when he outrages, beyond forgiveness, the dignity of the long suffering peasants. He receives his just rewards at their hands and is left to the mercies of Satan who descends with his victim into purgatory.

Jan. 10th THE SILENT HERO

Through "Ty" Lawyer McKenzie and the Countess Amanda Hall become acquainted, and later are married. The new butler having shown his infatuation for his mistress is dismissed, and during her husband's absence he decides to get revenge. "Ty" escapes his aim when he attempts to shoot him, and assists the countess in safely climbing down through the window of her room. The villain is arrested but manages to escape and waits in ambush for the lawyer. They struggle together at the very edge of a dangerously steep precipice, and it is "Ty" who saves his master from a most horrible death which is the end of the wicked butler.

BIOGRAPH.

THE MYSTERY OF THE MILK (Jan. 5).—If you were a thrifty housewife and every morning found your morning's milk gone from your doorstep, no doubt you would have created as much commotion as the housewives of this film. They raked in the cop on the beat, who solved the mystery, which, like most mysteries, was no mystery at all when it was solved. Anyway, wrathful parents smiled at themselves.

THE JANITOR'S REVENGE (Jan. 5).—The monarch of Labrador Flats sat in his throne room. Above, his long-suffering subjects shivered and shook. It may have been from fear; it may have been from cold. Rebellion spread and His Grace received an invitation to be present in Mulligan's flat. King Jant condescended to appear before his subjects, who played their playful little trick. Did Jant get even? You bet.

HIS FATHER'S HOUSE (Jan. 8).—The wife, put to the test of her love, supported her husband by singing at a local dance hall. The "puncher" found her fascinating. A brawl took place in the dance hall between him and her husband. Weary of life, the woman found a home, all unknown to herself, in the home of her husband's father. There her husband found her. Experience had brought him back to his father's house and its teachings.

THE BARTERED CROWN (Jan. 10).—It was a hard struggle Mina, the little lace-maker, had with the world, supplying the needs of herself and her crippled little sister. An expensive brace was necessary. There was only one way left. Mina decided to sell her hair. So her romantic young landlord bought it. Of course, being human, we know the end, but Mina didn't.

VITAGRAPH.

THE RIGHT AND THE WRONG OF IT (Jan. 12).—An office romance culminates in the marriage of Elsie and John. Dora, a girl from the country, gets Elsie's place at the office. After a short time Elsie realizes that she hates housework, and her interest in her home life wanes. She sees a crowd going to a matinee and longs to join them. In need of new clothes, she asks John for money to buy some. He is very short of funds and tells her he cannot let her have any at the time. She blames him, which starts a fuss, and a gulf is formed between them. Elsie goes to her old employer and offers to work for a dollar a week less than the new girl, if he will take her back. The employer discharges Dora and puts Elsie in her place.

John is very angry, but Elsie defies him and does as she pleases. Dora is unable to find work, and is eventually turned into the street without money. John finds his home unpleasant now and after one particularly cold and wretched supper, he leaves the house in anger to seek comfort elsewhere. He sees a girl sobbing and recognizes Dora. He takes her to a restaurant and learns of her misery. Bitterness is in both of their hearts, and when John suggests that they go away together, Dora consents. John returns home to get his belongings, and unexpectedly meets Elsie, who has just been out on a mysterious mission, and returned with a secret that makes her happy. The wife finds out what John is going to do, and she pleads with him not to leave her. Finally she tells him what is coming into their lives, and he realizes his duty, even as she realizes hers. They go to Dora and tell her the truth. She takes Elsie's position at the office. John cannot at once grasp the turn of affairs, but upon the birth of their child, the old happiness and love returns to both of them.

THE MASKED DANCER (Special—2 parts—Jan. 13).—Arriving in Mexico, Monroe, a promoter and mining expert, with his wife, Alice, makes his home in a little shack outside the town. Monroe goes to the general merchandise store in the town, where he gets a bag of gold which is waiting there for him. He is seen by Alonzo, the crafty dance hall manager, who plans to get some of the American's gold. He conspires with Dolores, the fascinating girl of the dance hall, whereby she is to win his affections and inveigle him into gambling.

Dolores easily captures the engineer. He becomes so fascinated with her when he sees her dancing in the evenings that he soon begins to neglect his wife. She immediately notices his strange indifference and is heartbroken. She confides in Pedro, a faithful old Mexican servant, who spies upon her husband and discovers the cause of his alienated affections. He advises Alice to disguise herself as a Mexican dancing girl and go to the dance hall and make free with the men in sight of her husband. She does so, and makes a great hit. She captivates her husband, who deserts Dolores to pay court to "The Masked Dancer." Dolores is furiously jealous. One of her Mexican friends comes up and orders the engineer to pay court to Dolores or to nobody. Monroe objects to this interference and a fight ensues. Alice is dragged out of the dance hall by several Mexicans. Pedro tries to follow, but is knocked down. When Monroe hastens out of the hall, Pedro tells him that his wife is being kidnapped. He rushes off with Pedro to overtake the party. He comes to a little house on the outskirts of the town, where he hears his wife scream. He rushes in, holding the crowd at bay at the point of a gun, he manages to rescue his wife from her assailants. A reconciliation follows between the young couple, when Monroe begs forgiveness, and promises never again to forget his love for his wife.

TIMING CUPID (Jan. 14).—Supported by an old uncle, Leslie Horton, a young bachelor living in luxury and indolence, is thought to be making good use of his time until the uncle surprises him and his friends by a friendly call during which he discovers the remains of a hastily removed game of poker. Thinking that the only way to make Leslie settle down and become of some value to the world, will be for him to marry, he angrily gives him just one month in which to select a wife of whom he will approve. Leslie is unsuccessful with the fair sex until one day, he finds a purse which he hastens to return to the owner, Grace Warner, with whom he falls in love.

While calling upon Grace he is kept waiting so long that he finally falls asleep. She finds him comfortably sleeping and sends the Swedish maid for an alarm clock, setting it for 5.30, and placing it near his head. Leslie is awakened by the alarm and is horrified when he sees the time, thinking he has slept there all night. He rushes out, meeting Lena, the maid, to whom he makes desperate love, as the time given him to find a wife is about up and he must meet the requirements in order to get his allowance.

He introduces the maid to his uncle, who becomes disgusted with Leslie's choice of a wife. Leslie returns to Grace's home, and after a stormy meeting with that young lady, he tells her the circumstances. She decides to help him. Grace is introduced to uncle, but too late, as the month's time is up. She attracts the old man in spite of himself. She walks about the room as though straightening things up, and she takes the opportunity to wind the clock and set it back to 11.55. Uncle's attention is called to the clock, he nods in approval, and the day is saved for Leslie.

THE BRUTE (Jan. 15).—Because he is a drunkard, Black Barton is despised by his friends and hated by his family He hates them in turn, because they do not understand that he fights against drink until nearly insane. Ted, his son, loves him, but fears him, and shrinks whene he is near him. The father loves his son and wants to be good to him, but is filled with brutal rage when the boy shrinks from him.

Barton goes to a saloon and drinks all day. A man whom Barton's wife had known in her girlhood days, comes to see her. She is excited and pleased to see him. The children like him and he is much taken with them. A neighbor, on the way to the saloon, sees the wife and her friend, and when he reaches the saloon he tells Black Barton, who starts home with the intent to kill the stranger. He comes to the house and looks in the window. He sees his wife laughing happily with the man and the children playing. He enters the house and the look of misery comes back to the wife's face and the children cower in fear. Barton realizes that without him his family have a chance of happiness. He turns abruptly and goes from the house. His son follows him and tries to call him back, but to no purpose, Arriving at the summit of a great precipice, he stands a moment, with his face turned towards the heavens, then plunges over the cliff and goes bounding down the rocky side to his death, hundreds of feet below. His body is found later by a party of prospectors. They realize as they look, that "The Brute" had a redeeming trait in his nature after all.

CUTEY'S VACATION (Jan. 16).—There is great excitement on the veranda of the mountain hotel when Miss Gammon Olde, spying through a field glass, sees Cutey approaching in a hack and announces, "Girls, a man is coming!" There is much patting of hair, fixing of ribbons, straightening of bows, as the cab draws up and Cutey alights. He is beseiged by the ladies.

Two young girls haul him off to the tennis court. After several games one of them takes him for a walk. They get lost in the woods. The girl falls and says that she has hurt her ankle. After wandering about a long time to get his bearings, he picks the girl up in his arms and carries her all the way back to the hotel. He tries to get some rest. But his peace is disturbed by Miss Olde, who insists upon reading aloud to him as he lies in the hammock. She prevents Miss Rich, whom he eagerly desires to meet, from stopping and making his acquaintance. Then comes a whole company of girls, who pinch and poke him in the ribs and beg him to assist them to decorate for the garden party that afternoon. When Miss Rich joins them in their pleas, he gladly consents. At the garden party Cutey makes rapid progress with Miss Rich. Miss Rich calls on Miss Olde in her room, and is seen entering by Cutey, who notes the number of the room, thinking it is Miss Rich's.

That night the hotel porters gather large piles of brush and set it on fire to rout the mosquitoes. Clouds of smoke arise and pour into Cutey's room. He awakens with a start and thinks that the hotel is on fire. Quickly grasping the opportunity to be a hero and rescue the beautiful Miss Rich, he rushes down to the room he saw Miss Rich enter and grabs Miss Olde, whom he carries down into the main hall.

He is met there by a rapidly growing assembly of hotel employees and guests, attracted by Miss Olde's screams. When he sees who he has rescued, and is told that the smoke is from a smudge, Cutey collapses into the arms of two porters, and has to be carried back to his room, groaning with disappointment, amid the convulsed laughter of the crowd.

LOCAL COLOR (Special—2 parts—Jan. 17).—In order to perfect himself for a part in a Broadway production, Edward Fenton, an actor, goes to the Southern mountains to acquire the speech and mannerisms of the mountaineers. He disguises himself as a mountaineer and travels through the wildest part of the country. After days of wandering, he falls senseless on the ground, overcome by fatigue. He is discovered by Dan Moore, an illicit whiskey dealer, who, upon seeing a signet ring on Fenton's finger, mistakes him for a revenue officer, and decides to leave him there to die. Anne Judson, a pretty mountain girl, happening to come along, finds the actor. She revives him and takes him to her home. He is received as a mountaineer and is shown every hospitality.

The days go by, and Fenton becomes more and more absorbed in gathering local color. He does not notice the change that takes place in Anne. She has learned to love the man she saved, and though she would like him to know it, he is totally blind to her affection. Not so Moore, however. He is aware of her love, and jealously forms a resolution to win her for himself.

Between the Moore and Judson clans there exists a feud. Knowing what will happen to Fenton should Moore expose him as a revenue officer, as he now threatens to do, Anne consents to elope with the illicit whiskey dealer to save the man she loves. When the Judson clan hears of her elopement, they ride out in pursuit of the man against whom they have sworn life-long hatred. Anne escapes and goes to Fenton, whom she urges to leave. Being now in love with her, he goes with her to the mountain fastnesses to evade the Moores and Judsons, who join forces to hunt them down. Trying to save Fenton, Anne is killed by Moore. Over her dead body the two men join hands in a common sorrow. When Fenton returns to New York, the applaus of audiences ring in his ears. Many times there comes before him the picture of a brave and beautiful mountain girl who gave him her love and her life.

JERRY'S UNCLE'S NAMESAKE (Special—2 parts—Jan. 6).—A reporter sees Jerry buying presents for a baby. She concludes they must be for his own. She puts an article in the paper, which Jerry's uncle in the country sees. He sends congratulations and intimates he might be moved to give Jerry a big check. Jerry mails uncle a photograph of "the baby"—his wife's dressmaker's baby—and invites uncle to visit him. Jerry borrows the dressmaker's baby and when uncle arrives, points proudly to it as his own. Uncle gives Jerry a big check. A critical situation arises when the dressmaker comes for her child. Jerry persuades her to wait. She agrees, but looks forbidding. She returns soon and insists upon the return of her child. With the baby gone Jerry is panic-stricken. He persuades uncle to go back home. But uncle misses his train and returns to wait and have another look at the baby.

Jerry telephones frantically to his wife to make some excuse. She rushes out and induces a friend to lend her a baby. Jerry, coming home, sees a colored mammy with a baby. When uncle is asleep in the parlor, Jerry rushes out and borrows it. Mary, the maid, realizing the situation, goes out and borrows a baby from the wife of the butcher. Jerry returns. The baby he has is heavy and has long hair. The first baby was light and had no hair. Jerry is trying to explain, when his wife comes in with baby number two. Uncle is bewildered. He asks if Jerry has twins. Twins! Of course! A fine explanation! Uncle makes out a second check.

While Jerry and his wife have taken the "twins" from the room, Mary enters and takes uncle upstairs and shows him baby number three. She has not seen the other two. Jerry's triplicity is discovered when three mothers arrive and clamor for their children. The dressmaker comes also to show off Jerry's little namesake in its new clothes. Four babies! Uncle demands the return of his check and he stamps angrily from the house. Jerry collapses and jumps at the sound of anything that reminds him of babies.

OFFICER JOHN DONOVAN (Special—2 parts—Jan. 10).—Kind and good natured, policeman John Donovan is a great favorite. He has one son, Ted, a boy of about seventeen, of whom he is very fond. Ted is a wild sort of fellow. In a quarrel over some cards one night, he imagines he has killed one of the players. He skips town, leaving a note, saying he will not come back until he has made good. Lawton, a gambler, deserts Marion Gray, a young country girl. They have one child, a little baby. Marion secures permission to come home. She goes, first leaving her child on a doorstep, afraid to let her father see it. The baby is found by officer Donovan, who takes it to the Sisters of Mercy, where it is kindly cared for. Donovan becomes attached to it and goes often to see it. The years go by and the child grows into a beautiful young girl. Donovan takes Daisy from the Sisterhood and gives her a home with him. As Donovan is getting old, Rigland, a political boss, who wishes to get some of his friends onto the force, has Donovan put on the pension list and retired. Daisy, his ward, goes to the Mayor and has her guardian appointed doorkeeper at one of the stations.

Resembling John Dove, a noted counterfeiter, Donovan is appointed a special detective to capture the criminal's accomplices. By posing as Dove, Donovan is admitted into the stronghold of the crooks. His son, Ted, now a fine young fellow, comes home. Thinking that he may learn of his father's whereabouts through the underworld, he goes to the criminal's hang-out to see one of the leaders, whom he knows. He discovers the presence of his father, and wittingly manages to help him against the crooks, who are suspicious of his identity. A message is gotten to the police and a large force of officers arrive. The crooks are taken after a desperate fight in which Ted received a slight wound. At his father's home, Ted is very happy as he lies back in bed, and looks up into the face of Daisy, who is fondly reading to him by his bedside.

ESSANAY.

THE HAND THAT ROCKS THE CRADLE (Jan. 13).—Willard Gryson, a clerk in the employ of the Government, leads an ideal home life with his charming wife and his two-months-old son Tyson Rockwell, a capitalist, and his henchman, needs certain private government reports to put over a big deal, and meeting Gryson one day coming from the government offices, offer him a flattering price for the necessary papers. Gryson at first is firm in his resolution not to be bribed, but finally succumbs to the temptation. His wife accidentally finds the slip of paper telling him "there is $5,000 waiting for you at a certain hotel. Come and get it." Her woman's intuition warns her that her husband is on the brink of an abyss, so when he is leaving that evening, she takes the government reports from his pocket and, substitutes this little note: "Is the father of our baby going to make us ashamed of him?" which, when he reads it, brings him to his senses and makes him realize what a narrow escape he had.

THE REAL MISS LOVELEIGH (Jan. 14).—When Leo Whitney started writing the "advice to the lovesick" column in one of the great daily papers, under the name of Evelyn Loveleigh, little did he know that the love god would take possession of him. We see "her" very much a man, seated in his office smoking an immense pipe, and answering such silly letters as "A young man calls on me several evenings a week, but has not proposed as yet. Would you advise me to start making my trousseau?" Of course he has a good laugh over each letter and gives the writers expert advice, but when he in turn falls a victim, he falls so hard that the laugh is on him.

THE STORY OF THE OLD GUN (Jan. 15).—Raymond Beahan, a young chap from the city, pays a visit to his uncle, John Purcell, the sheriff. The day after he arrives, he dresses up in his uncle's hat, cartridge belt, chaps, etc., and is about to take an old gun from the wall to put in his belt when his uncle asks him not to take the gun, as he prizes it very highly. He then tells the boy the story of how the gun came into his possession. The story is so vivid to the boy, that when his uncle leaves him to round up some bandits, and he is left alone in the cabin, he falls asleep and dreams the same story his uncle has just related to him, only HE is the hero. In the dream, in the act of backing out of the bandit's way, he falls over a high cliff, and suddenly awakens to find himself precipitated upon the floor.

BRONCHO BILLY—GUARDIAN (Jan. 17).—It seems a pity that some people are allowed the care of children. Broncho Billy hears a child scream and rushes on the scene in time to prevent Jim Haley, a big brute of a man, from beating his little daughter, Josie, with a horse whip. Later, Haley and Pedro, a half-breed, are caught rustling cattle and are given the customary treatment, but not before Haley writes a note to Josie, stating that the boys will take care of her. The boys send Josie east to school and ten years later, when she returns a young lady, they all fall in love with her. Broncho Billy tells Josie how much he cares for her, but she tells him she loves him only as a daughter would love her father, and that her heart is given to Jack Patton. Broncho Billy is heartbroken. Patton, who has led a rather wild life, promises Broncho Billy he will reform to make himself worthy of Josie.

THE CAST OF THE DIE (Special—2 parts—Jan. 16).—Fred Church, a young chap in a small Western town, secures a position in the grocery store of Harry Todd. Todd is somewhat miserly and keeps close watch of Fred when alone in the store. A few days later Todd misses sums of money from the cash drawer and feels certain Fred is the thief. In reality the thefts are caused by rats, who had made a nest lined with bills taken from the cash drawer. Discovering Fred lurking suspiciously near the drawer one day, Todd summons a detective, who attempts to arrest Fred. Enraged by the accusation, Fred knocks the detective down and hurries to his home, where he breathlessly explains his predicament to his old father and mother. Receiving little encouragement from them, he packs up his things and beats his way out of town on a freight train that night. Meanwhile the rats in Todd's store nibble around the shelf of matches, setting them off, and the grocery, together with several adjoining buildings, are destroyed by the flames.

Five years later we find Fred a prospector in the heart of the West, with a wife and little child. One day, while in town, Fred receives a letter from his father, stating the authorities have discovered his whereabouts and have detectives on his trail with a warrant charging him with robbery and arson. Fearful of discovery, Fred starts for his shack, but is seen by two detectives who have traced him and immediately start in pursuit. Meanwhile True Boardman, a notorious outlaw, is wounded by the sheriff's posse and falls unconscious beside the trail as Fred drives along. Fred takes the wounded man to his shack, where it is found the outlaw's wound is mortal. Fearing for his own safety, Fred shows his wife the letter and reveals to her the story of the past. The letter left lying on the table, is found by Fred's little girl, who toddles into the bedroom and playfully shows it to the wounded man, together with her dolly. A few minutes later Mrs. Church discovers the two detectives drive up outside the shack, secretes Fred and resolutely determines to try and throw them off the track. Meanwhile, in the next room, the outlaw, realizing death is near, reads the letter and determines on a noble sacrifice—the last he will ever make. A moment later the detectives enter, question Mrs. Church, notice she is barring the way to an adjoining bedroom, thrust her aside and enter—to find the outlaw dead with the letter in his pocket. Thinking the outlaw is Church, and that their mission is ended, they depart quietly from the room and drive away. Later Church and his wife discover how the dead outlaw had saved him from certain capture and kneel beside the bed in prayer and thanksgiving.

INDIAN BLOOD (Special—2 parts—Jan. 12).—Oleta, the Indian wife of Lieutenant Hayes, learns that her husband is ashamed of her. The woman discovers that her ten-year-old son, Wayne, is to be sent East to be educated. Determined that her boy shall not be taken from her, Oleta kidnaps him and runs away. Hayes discovers Oleta's flight and follows. He overtakes his wife. Deeply stirred by the incident, the father forces his son from Oleta's arms and harshly orders her to return to her people. Oleta makes her way to the camp of

A DELIGHTFUL and INTERESTING STORY OF A SON'S ACCIDENT — A MOTHER'S DEVOTION — HUSBAND'S MISPLACED DISTRUST — AND THE MIRACLE OF TIME

PRODUCED BY G. MÉLIÈS
PARIS . NEW YORK

Storm Cloud, her brother. After telling her story, the broken-hearted mother dies. Thirsting for revenge, Storm Cloud and his tribe attack a troop of soldiers convoying an immigrant train and slays them to the last man. Ten years later, Wayne returns from college. His first thought is of his mother. Ignorant of Oleta's death, Hayes, now a general, tells Wayne that she is with her people.

The boy steals from the fort and finds Storm Cloud's encampment. At the same time, General Hayes receives orders to move against the Indians. Storm Cloud tells Wayne of Oleta's wrongs and of her death. Standing beneath the scaffold bearing his mother's remains, Wayne renounces the ways of the white man. Hayes and his men come upon Wayne and Storm Cloud. The latter is made prisoner. The father learns of his son's intention to return to Oleta's people. He tries in vain to alter Wayne's resolution. Later, Wayne helps Storm Cloud to escape. The Indians in searching for their chief, come upon the soldiers. A terrific battle takes place. Storm Cloud shoots at General Hayes. Wayne throws himself in front of his father and receives the bullet in his own breast. Smiling gently at his grief-crazed father, the boy passes away.

PERILS OF THE WHITE LIGHTS (Special—2 parts—Jan. 14).—Annabelle unwittingly places herself in the power of Kramer, a notorious rake. Confronted by dire danger, the girl shoots him in self-defense. Later the show girl is placed on trial for murder and is freed. Harris, a man-about-town, becomes interested in Annabelle. He suggests that the girl return to the stage and capitalize the notoriety she has gained. Annabelle repulses the man. Determined to start life anew, the girl leaves for the country and makes her home with the Fosters, some distant relatives. The latter are ignorant of Annabelle's past. Jack, Mrs. Foster's son, falls in love with the girl. Because of her secret, Annabelle refuses to marry him. But the specter of her past rises to confront her when she meets Harris, who, by chance, steps off the train which stops for a few minutes at the little station. Although Harris had not intended to stay in the village, he changes his mind when he sees Annabelle.

He again tries to induce her to return to the stage. When she refuses, the villain threatens to expose her. Terror-stricken, Annabelle writes a note of explanation to Mrs. Foster and runs away. Foiled, Harris secures revenge by telling Mrs. Foster of Annabelle's past. To his surprise, the good woman announces her intention of standing by the unfortunate girl. Mrs. Foster learns of Annabelle's flight. Heartbroken, the woman tells the story to Jack. The boy leaves for the city, vowing to return with the girl he loves. Jack searches for many days. Tired and hungry, he drops into a restaurant. The voice of the waitress causes him to raise his head. At the sight of Jack, Annabelle starts back in surprise. A moment later the boy has her in his arms, heedless of the people about him. Two hours later, Annabelle is on her way back to the country as Jack's bride.

ONLY ONE SHIRT (Jan. 16).—Billy and Jack return home for the holiday with just two shirts between them. Jack's shirt is ruined when an ink bottle is upset. His sweetheart, Mabel, having informed him of her intention of spending the day out of town, Billy decides to stay home all day, and loans his shirt to Jack.

Mabel, however, misses her train. She phones Billy, requesting him to call. With his only shirt on Jack's back, Billy tells her that he is ill and cannot leave the house. Alarmed, Mabel decides to call upon her sweetheart. She meets Jack. The latter tries to dissuade her, but Mabel insists that her place is by Billy's sick-bed.

Billy tries to buy a shirt, but finds the stores closed for the day. Later, in peering out of the window, the shirtless boy sees Jack and Mabel apparently enjoying a stroll. In jealous rage, Billy dives into bed and refuses to talk to Mabel when she enters. In revenge, Mabel flirts with Jack. This is more than Billy can stand. With a bound, he is out of bed and engages in a lively mixup with his astonished chum. Fearing her sweetheart has gone crazy, Mabel calls a policeman. The fighters are parted and Mabel learns the story of the ruined shirt. Billy waits until his sweetheart finishes laughing. "Are—are you sure you love me without a shirt?" he anxiously inquires.

THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON (Jan. 16).—The Lord Mayor's Show, celebrated annually at London, is one of England's most spectacular events. This topical feature gives a series of superb views of the inauguration of Sir Thomas Vansittart Bowater, the new Lord Mayor, and of the picturesque procession, the participants of which were clad in the quaint garb of the Sixteenth Century.

Among the seven other topical scenes is a view of Lloyd George, Chancellor of the Exchequer, delivering one of his history-making addresses, at Bedford, England. The fact that Mr. George is regarded as one of England's greatest statesman of to-day makes this picture of timely interest.

RED HAWK'S SACRIFICE (Jan. 17).—Binfield goes to the rescue of Starlight when the Indian maid is threatened by Burns, a desperado. The gambler and the girl fall in love with each other. Red Hawk loves Starlight. Knowing of this love, several members of his tribe attempt to do away with Binfield. Red Hawk, however, nobly declares that Starlight shall marry the man of her choice. Five years pass. Red Hawk is deeply attached to Arthur, Starlight's three-year-old son. Binfield learns that the Indian frequently visits his cabin. His suspicions are aroused. The following day, the gambler wins a large sum of money. Burns plans to rob the man. He gets a band of Indians to aid him. Red Hawk overhears the plot. He dashes away to the cabin to warn Binfield.

The Indian finds Starlight and her son alone. He places them on his horse and leads them to safety, knowing the fate in store for the gambler's wife and child should Burns and his band come upon the cabin. Binfield witnesses the incident from afar. He believes that Red Hawk is eloping with Starlight and follows. The sheriff learns of the contemplated holdup and goes to the rescue with his posse. Meanwhile, the gambler overtakes Red Hawk and shoots him down. Starlight then tells her husband of her former suitor's nobility. The posse overtakes Burns and his band. A desperate battle ensues and the thieves are wiped out. The sheriff comes upon Red Hawk's body. He believes the Indian to have been killed by Burns. Stricken with remorse, Binfield vows to atone for his terrible crime by leading a better life. With his arms about Starlight and Arthur, the gambler slowly walks toward his cabin.

TELL-TALE STAINS (Jan. 10).—Mrs. King, wife of a millionaire, plans to give a masquerade ball. An epidemic of jewel robberies causes her husband to hire Detective Burke and his assistant, Mary Macey, to attend the affair. Burke informs King that his costume for the evening will be that of a burglar, while Mary will be clad as a cowgirl. King jots this down in a note book. The book later drops out of his pocket and is found by Diamond Al, a notorious crook. The man resolves to attend the affair disguised similarly to Burke. Burke reads of a $20,000 jewel robbery. He believes it to have been Diamond Al's work. The detective describes the crook to Mary. According to Burke, Diamond Al has the nicotine-stained fingers of a cigarette fiend.

On the night of the masquerade ball, Diamond Al, lurking on the veranda, sees King show the detectives the little safe in the wall which contains the family jewels. Later the crook enters the room. Burke catches him in the act of robbing the safe. A struggle ensues. Burke is stunned by the criminal. Diamond Al binds and gags his victim, after which he lays him on the veranda. The crook returns to the room just as Mary enters. Mistaking him for Burke, the girl requests that he dance with her. The mask on his face prevents Mary from discovering her partners identity. Later, however, she sees the nicotine stains on his fingers. Burke revives and succeeds in freeing himself. Mary holds Diamond Al up with her gun. The man seizes the weapon from her hand just as Burke enters. The detective leaps upon the crook from behind. Despite Diamond Al's struggles, Burke makes him a prisoner.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE ACTRESS' JEWELS (The First Story of Octavius—Amateur Detective Series—Jan 12).—Octavius had so much money that he hadn't the least notion what to do with it. At length he desired to become a detective. Shortly after his decision, large headlines appeared in the papers announcing to a credulous public that the jewels of Julia Vane, the famous actress, had been stolen. As a matter of fact, Miss Vane's jewels were safe in her jewelry box, but as her press agent wanted some advertising, and as news happened to be scarce, the head lines appeared. Fired with a chivalric impulse, Octavius proffered his services in the recovery of the missing jewelry. When Julia heard he was coming, she took the jewels out of her jewelry box and hid them. Since she was not exactly averse to publicity, she gladly accepted the aid of the amateur detective.

Octavius put the servants through a rigorous cross-examination, and left the apartment. On the way home a sudden thought struck him. He should have examined the jewelry box for finger prints. He stopped short and retraced his steps to Miss Vane's apartment. Miss Vane had gone to a rehearsal. Just before she left she returned the jewels to the box and left the apartment in the care of a maid, who shortly afterward departed on her own affairs. Octavius readily gained admittance to the apartment, took the box, and left a note of explanation for Miss Vane.

Shortly after he left, two real burglars entered the apartment in quest of loot. They found Octavius' note, and decided that it was filled with promise. So they went to that young man's house and wrested the case from his unwilling hands. Miss Vane returned, missed her jewels, found the note, summoned the police, and hastened after Octavius. Miss Vane and the police entered just after the burglars had taken the box from Octavius, so there was nothing for that young man to do except to assume an air of intense wisdom, and denounce the burglars to the police. So everybody was happy except the burglars.

A NIGHT AT THE INN (Jan. 13).—Frank Harding was very indignant when his mule balked. Frank was anxious to get down to the fiesta in the great city, and he was aggrieved that fate should delay him by so ordinary a reason as an obstinate mule. Frank beat the mule, and finding him still obstinate, dismounted. Thereupon the mule promptly ran away, and Frank, in a very bad humor, started forth in search of shelter and food. A chance-met peasant, Carlo by name, proved to be the proprietor of a hostlery to which he guided Frank. The house was not prepossessing in appearance, but the tired and hungry traveler was little concerned about appearances. The bright smile of the landlord's sister and the warm supper which was set before him, soon made him forget the discomforts he had experienced.

Now, as it happened, the landlord was a thoroughly disreputable person. His house was a favorite resort for people of doubtful reputations, and rumors of dark and sinister deeds were connected with the person of Carlo himself. When Frank exhibited a well-filled purse, the landlord's greed was instantly aroused. At first he endeavored to win the guest's money at cards, but finding he had to deal with a shrewd and expert player, soon changed his tactics.

Calling his sister to one side, he gave her a small vial which he bade her empty in the stranger's wine to make him sleep soundly. Maria, the sister, attracted by Frank's manner, spoiled this plot at the last moment and Carlo was obliged to resort to even darker devices. When Frank expressed a desire to sleep, the landlord led him to a room wherein an old fashioned bed was built into the wall. Frank was just composing himself for slumber when something suddenly caused him to spring up, wide awake. Although he could see the top of a picture when he got into bed, he could now see only its middle. As he looked in astonishment, he suddenly realized that the heavy roof of the bed was descending slowly but surely upon him. Cold with horror, he sprang from the bed. The cover of the bed descended until it lay on the surface on which he had been lying so shortly before. A stealthy step sounded outside, and the landlord entered to rob his supposed victim. Frank grappled with him, and a furious fight ensued, which was stopped by the arrival of officers who had been summoned by Maria.

ANDY PLAYS HERO (Jan. 14).—On her death bed, Mary Worth begged her dearest friend, Helen Turner, to take care of her little girl and to keep the child out of the hands of Roger Steele, Mrs. Worth's brother-in-law. The little girl would be heiress to a considerable fortune, and Mrs. Worth knew that her sanctimonious and hypocritical brother-in-law would spare no pains to gain possession of the child. A month after the mother's death, Steele, who had obtained legal authority, came to Miss Turner's home and demanded that the child be surrendered to him. Miss Turner refused, and Steele indignantly departed to seek legal aid. During his absence, the girl fled with her charge to a hotel.

Steele, returning to the Turner home with his lawyer, succeeded in obtaining information of Miss Turner's whereabouts from a footman, and started in pursuit. Since the telephone communication was broken, Miss Turner's maid scribbled a hasty note and started from the house in an attempt to warn her mistress. On the street she met our young friend, Andy. Giving him the note, she exhorted him to take it to Miss Turner immediately. Andy jumped on the back of a taxicab, and succeeded in reaching the hotel before Steele, but not soon enough to allow Miss Turner to escape from her pursuers.

While Steele and the lawyer thundered at the door, a brilliant idea occurred to Andy. He and the little girl were just about the same size. Why not let him dress up in her clothes? Miss Turner instantly fell in with the idea, and the change in clothes was effected. Then Steele and the lawyer were admitted. While the men were engaged in catching the exceedingly active little girl who appeared before them, Miss Turner and the apparent messenger boy had no difficulty in escaping.

Steele took his supposed niece home, and to salve his outraged pride, prepared to give her a sound whipping. Andy, apprised of his intentions, thought that things had gone far enough, and told Steele who he was. Andy escaped from the enraged man and came home. Steele, filled with virtuous indignation, repaired to court and complained that a designing woman refused to give up his dear little niece to him. But Andy appeared and testified as to the treatment Steele had prepared for his dear little niece, and the court, learning Steele's true nature, officially declared Miss Turner the child's guardian.

DOWN LONE GAP WAY (Jan. 13).—Frank, in his continual search for the gold which he never finds, has met and married a good looking Indian girl. Becoming destitute, he writes his uncle for money, but receives a reply in which his uncle tells him he has made his own bed and must lie in it. While in desperate straits he meets Red Fleming, who succors the little family. Red asks Frank if he doesn't want some easy money, and induces him to hold up the Lone Gap stage with him. They do so and wound Frank's uncle, who, unknown to him, is a passenger. The two bandits are pursued by a sheriff's posse, and after a fight Red is killed. Frank finds his way home and finds there his wounded uncle. Confronted by the evidence of his handiwork Frank confesses and is advised by his uncle to give himself up. His uncle further promises him that he will look after his wife and child while he is serving his term. Frank accepts the advice and pays the penalty for his rash act.

COLONEL HEEZA LIAR'S AFRICAN HUNT (Jan. 14).—Mistaking a tiger's tail for a snake, Colonel Heeza Liar puts himself in wrong with a big tiger, who gives him a very bad quarter of an hour, until the matchless courage and ingenuity of our hero overcomes him.

Next our friend mistakes a bear's ears for a butterfly, and tries to net them, with the result that soon he is up a tree only a breath or two in advance of the bear. Things look very dark for him, especially as the bear energetically tries to shake the colonel from his perch like a ripe apple, but again his resourcefulness finds a victory. As a final grand windup he makes the biggest bag of game, all at one shot that anyone ever secured under similar circumstances.

THE SEVENTEEN-MILE DRIVE, CALIFORNIA (Jan. 14).—Scenically this drive is perhaps the most famous in the country, and justly so. Here is a combination of trees, rocks and roaring ocean that is beautiful beyond words. As fine a scenic as one would wish and a good argument for the slogan of "See America First."

A THIEF OF HEARTS (Special—2 parts—Jan. 15).—Pierre de Brezeux, a young man of wealth and refinement, becomes engaged to a beautiful and worthy girl of his station in life, Marthe Rozay. Pierre has one fault, weakness, and this is the cause of becoming entoiled with a dancer, Ida Bianca, who has determined to win him. In spite of his infatuation, Pierre really wishes to be true to his fiancée, but with arts and wiles the dancer keeps him at her side.

One day he is persuaded to take Ida to dine openly in the Pavilion du Bois, in the Bois de Boulogne. It is a fatal step, for he is seen and his enraged fiancée, wounded to the heart, breaks off the engagement in an interview the next day, in which Marthe shows herself more grieved than bitter.

So Pierre is tighter in the wiles of Ida than ever. Ida, conscious that she is the agressor in the love affair, endeavors to make him jealous by flirting with Novita, a famous matador. Novita is the one to become jealous, for he falls in love with her with sudden violence, and she delights in torturing him.

Pierre proposes to Ida a motor trip to Spain, and the beauty of the scenery and the pleasure of the trip make them happier than they have been before. Running out of gasoline, Pierre stops a passing car and requests a small supply, which is granted. The occupants alight and Pierre finds himself face to face with Marthe. Their embarressment is increased by Ida's disdainful attitude. Pierre suffers badly and on arriving in Madrid, writes Marthe a letter of apology and tells her if he had been warned the regrettable incident would not have happened. Marthe is grateful, for the note tells her that Pierre's self-respect is not yet dead.

In Madrid Ida renews acquaintance with Novita, who begs her to leave Pierre. She refuses for the time, in spite of the fact that her love for Pierre is waning. Finally Novita writes her a note on the eve of a great bull-fight, telling her that unless she can give him hope he will throw himself, the next day, upon the horns of the bull. If she holds out hope to wear violets at the bull-fight.

The note is delivered at the hotel to Pierre in Ida's absence. He puts it in his pocket and forgets it. On the morrow he attends the bull-fight with Ida. Novita, failing to see the violets, keeps his promise and the terrible tragedy totally unbalances Ida. She shows her love for the dead matador plainly, and when Pierre, remembering at last the letter, gives it to her, her anger knows no bounds. After a terrific quarrel, they part, and Pierre realizes fully for the first time, all he has lost by his entanglement with the woman and the depth of his folly.

GOOD PALS (Special—2 parts—Jan. 17).—John Kane, who is passionately fond of his sweet little daughter, has opened his house to a spinster cousin of his, who is alone in the world. Jane repays his kindness by secret envy and hate, and her chief passion in life is the hoarding of the money given her and counting it over and over. On the surface, however, she is suave and smiling. On only one thing does she palpably show the hate which settles within her—she detests Shep, the beautiful and intelligent collie dog belonging to Beatrice and the idol of her heart.

Kane sells his ranch and departs for home. Having dismounted from his horse to make camp, he is attacked by bears, and seriously injured. He is found, apparently dead, by an unscrupulous frontiersman, who removes the money belt, containing the $15,000, and also the letter announcing the offer for the ranch. The frontiersman goes to the nearest gambling hall, and risking the stolen money in play, adds to it considerably. The large sum of money in his possession is noticed by two bandits, who follow him as he leaves, waylay and kill him. They are about to rob him, when they are driven away by the sheriff, who has watched and suspected them. The money and the letter giving Kane's address, are found upon the body and the sheriff, assuming that the dead man is Kane, sends the money to a lawyer in the same city, with instructions to turn it over to the legal heir. The lawyer thus turns over the money to Jane as the legal guardian of the child. Overjoyed at the windfall she plans to keep the money herself and not to reveal the source of it to Beatrice. Finding now an opportunity to give vent to her hate she tells her that her good-for-nothing father is dead, that she is a pauper and will have to work for a living. Dressed in rags and broken-hearted with abuse, the child is banished to the attic, where only the faithful dog, who finds his way to her in spite of all obstacles, keeps her company.

How Mr. Kane recovered and came home to expose the villainy of the woman and rescue his daughter, is one of the best parts of a very good story.

MELIES.

THE SOMNAMBULIST (Jan. 8).—Boris, the son of Prince Ludovic and his wife, is thrown from his horse and killed. The mother's grief is inconsolable.

Some months later, the prince has occasion to warn a dangerous poacher off his preserves. The poacher, in revenge, writes a note to the prince, throwing suspicion on his wife's honor. The prince takes no notice of the communication, but the germ of suspicion has been sown, and he begins to watch his wife every night. One night he sees her emerge from her bedroom and walk down toward the park. He follows and raises his hand to strike her, when the truth suddenly bursts upon him. His wife has got into the habit of walking in her sleep, and when the obsession is strongest its effect is to lead her down to the tomb where Boris lies buried.

Time, however, works a miracle, for a new little life has stirred within her, and the instinct of motherhood knows but one call—that of giving all and sacrificing all for the child that is just born.

LUBIN.

SMILES OF FORTUNE (Jan. 12).—Silas Gregg, a wealthy old grouch, who thinks he is about to die, sends for his nephew and heir, Ezekiel Grubb, and warns him to come smiling, as he (Silas) is sick of long faces. Zeke is in despair, his face is naturally so solemn that a smile is impossible. He seeks the assistance of a beauty doctor, who adorns his features with a broad grin, which is guaranteed never to come off. Uncle Silas is wild with rage when Zeke presents himself at the bedside smiling with apparent delight. He decides not to die at all, and drives the disowned and miserable, but still smiling, Zeke from the house.

Zeke is engaged to his cousin, Amanda, whose face is naturally as solemn as Zeke's. In the hope of pleasing her lover by always greeting him with a smile, she, too, has taken treatment with permanent results. Silas sends for her, writing that she shall inherit his fortune. Zeke, at the sight of her face, is broken-hearted, thinking she will receive the same treatment accorded him, but there is no help for it, and Amanda goes, smiling.

Meanwhile, the old man's other relations, thinking to take a tip from Zeke's experience, have shown him nothing but faces of gloom. Amanda's radiant smile is like sunshine in a dark room. Silas is so pleased with her that he at once makes her a deed of gift to a bulk of his property, and she at once marries Zeke. Old Silas' first emotion is rage, but two such smiles together cannot be resisted, and he embraces the young people with a grin as broad as their own.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY (Jan. 12).—First we see the gathering of the leaf at the large plantation. This is mainly done by men. The sorting is done by girls. The leaves are strung on rails and taken to the drying rooms. Next the stripping of fibre and storks from the leaves, after which they are twisted into ropes, in which shape the tobacco is ready for shipment to the markets. All of the work is done by the West Indian negroes. The old women are incessant smokers and favor the short clay pipe.

THE INSCRIPTION (Jan. 13).—John Bobb and Nell Phelan had been sweethearts long before the war in the South. John wins Nell's consent and that of her father. He is discussing the wedding date when his friends get him to join them in the rush for gold. Nell has a premonition that all will not be well, but John laughs at her fears, especially when she gives him a written message: "Don't forget Nell." He leaves and promptly forgets her in the greed for gold that takes possession of him.

In the meantime, Nell's father is visited by Sam Band, the son of his old chum. Sam is made welcome and falls in love with Nell. As the weeks and months pass by with no word from John, she gradually turns to Sam. John has totally forgotten and is still searching for the will-o-the-whisp. Finally Sam wins out and he and Nell are married.

About this time John strikes it rich and as he is packing up his things to return to civilization, he finds the written message. He still thinks there is a chance for him, even if he has neglected Nell, and goes back to the old town. He finds her happily married and she scathingly rebukes him, while at the same time agreeing to his request for a photo of her in remembrance. She writes on the back the following: "In my great happiness I wish you well." His emotion gets the better of him and he kisses her hand, while she pats his hair in a caress of sympathy. Sam enters and, unseen, witnesses the kiss, the touch on the hair and the pocketing of the photo. Enraged, he waits for John, attacks him at the road house, and gets the photo, then returns to Nell. She shows him the reverse side, and ashamed he returns to John and secures his forgiveness with a return of the photo. Then he goes back to his wife happy and contented.

A QUESTION OF RIGHT (Special—2 parts—Jan. 15).—Louise Gray marries Mayor Hogan on the belief that he is a clean, upright man. In doing so she rejects the suit of Vance, a city detective, who has been a persistent suitor for her hand. Louise does not know that Hogan is a scheming, crooked politician. She is also unaware of the fact that her own brother, Jim Gray, a degenerate, is blackmailing Hogan because of his relations with another woman.

Soon after Louise's marriage to Hogan she learns of his true character. Through the efforts of Detective Vance she sees Hogan accept a big bribe. She determines to expose his real character to his political followers, in spite of the fact that it will mean an end to her happiness. The night Hogan accepts the bribe he is notified by an enthusiastic crowd that calls at his home of his re-nomination for mayor. Louise interrupts Hogan in the midst of his speech of acceptance and denounces him as a crook. Hogan exhibits terrible anger towards Louise later, and threatens her so much that she decides to leave him.

As she prepares to leave the house she finds his murdered body in the library. Vance, her former detective lover, calls to cover the case, and in spite of Louise's protestations, believes her guilty of the crime and proceeds to put her through a nerve-racking "third degree." Louise, her nerves wrecked by the ordeal, finally admits that she has killed Hogan, and faints. At the same moment Gray, Louise's brother, the blackmailer, is discovered in a closet, where he had been trapped in trying to escape from the house. He confesses that he has killed Hogan for the latter's refusal to give him

IN MYSTERIOUS WAYS (Jan. 16).—Joe Anson, a young miner, lives in a Western foothill country with his bride of a year, Anna. Joe, one morning, leaves the house, saying that he is going to the mine. At the mine trail, however, he remembers that it is their first wedding anniversary, and he rides on to the village store, where he buys a pretty fan for Anna. Sallie Spriggs, old maid gossip, sees the purchase and is curious. Leaving the store, Joe is hailed by two members of the township school board. They tell him that the new school teacher will arrive unexpectedly on the next train, and they insist it is his duty as president of the board, to escort the young lady to the valley.

Joe is reluctant, but finally consents. They meet the new teacher at the station and she and Joe start for the valley on horseback. Sallie goes to Joe's house, to make a day's call on Anna. While dinner is being prepared, Sallie wanders out along the edge of the bluff that overlooks the valley. On the valley road, far below, Sallie is horrified to see Joe and a strange girl riding. The gossip hurriedly calls Anna and shows her the scene. She also tells Anna that she saw Joe buying a pretty fan at the store. Anna's jealousy is aroused and she returns to the house accompanied by Sallie.

When Joe returns that evening, he finds Anna in a fury. She locks herself in her bedroom, refusing to listen to a word of explanation. Joe, after recovering from his surprise, instinctively feels that Sallie is responsible for the situation and orders her from the house. Anna sleeps in her locked room that night; Joe camps out in the main room. Next morning Joe finds Anna still unrelenting. Provoked himself, Joe leaves for the mine. Anna, determined to leave Joe's roof, packs her trunk and a suitcase. Ready to leave the house, Anna stops in the main room to stare scornfully at a large crayon portrait of Joe, which hangs on the wall. As she looks, the portrait falls from the wall. Concurrent with the fall of the picture, Joe, at the mine, loses his footing and falls over a cliff. He manages to grasp an overhanging bush and hangs suspended in a perilous position. Anna, startled by the fall of the picture, is convinced that some accident has befallen Joe. Forgetting her jealousy, she goes to the mine, rescues Joe and learns of the simple explanation regarding the fan and the strange girl.

A SERVANT OF THE RICH (Jan. 17).—Marian Abbott is interested in the welfare of servants. As she has no trouble with them in the suburbs, she wonders why the papers are full of the trouble society people have in the city. She shows her servants the articles and questions them, and is told it is because the society people in the cities do not treat their help like human beings. At the meeting of the Servants' Welfare Society she tells them she is going to get a position with one of the society women as a maid and learn the real cause of the trouble.

Meanwhile, on the way to the meeting her auto gets beyond her control and if it were not for the quick work of a stranger she would have run over a child. She cannot thank the man, Adrian Vandevere, a New York society man, enough. She does not learn his identity nor does he see her face very clearly, because of her goggles. She hires out as a maid with Mrs. Wadleigh, a society leader. She learns of the long hours, for which there is no extra pay, the left-over food and the bad ventilation in the servant's room. A social war is on and Mrs. Wadleigh hits upon a scheme to humiliate her rival, Mrs. Vandevere. She tells Marian she will dress her up like a lady and introduce her into society and when Mrs. Vandevere has taken her up she will humiliate her by telling who Marian is. Marian objects to the trick, but when she learns that Mrs. Vandevere's son is the man that helped her out home, she decides to do it.

Mrs. Wadleigh dresses her up magnificently and coaches her to meet society folks, an operation that almost sends Marian into convulsions of laughter. She makes her debut at an affair given by Mrs. Vandevere and meets Adrian again. She recognizes him at once and he feels sure he met her, but both Marian and Mrs. Wadleigh assure him that is impossible. He takes possession of her right away and shows so plainly his infatuation that Mrs. Wadleigh cannot help gloat over the success of her plan and sees an even greater humiliation awaiting Mrs. Vandevere and her son, if the latter will only propose. He proposes and she accepts. She refrains from telling him who she is, however, so that the little comedy can go its length. At a party Mrs. Vandevere announces the engagement. There is an uproar of congratulations, broken only by Mrs. Wadleigh's hilarious laughter. Called upon for an explanation, she exposes the trick and Mrs. Vandevere almost faints. Adrian comes to the rescue of the situation by telling Marian he intends standing by her. Marian steps into the breach by telling the truth about herself and recalling to Adrian's mind where he met her before. It is now Mrs. Wadleigh's turn to be discomfited and in a rage she departs for home. Mrs. Vandevere receives Marian gladly, and gloates over the fact that the trick proved a boomerang. Mrs. Wadleigh's defeat is further brought home to her when she reads in the paper Marian's expose of servants' conditions in such a way that everybody will know just who is meant by the leader of society who employed her.

GEORGE KLEINE.

WHO WAS GUILTY? (Special—2 parts—Cines—Jan. 27).—Van Luin is the owner of a large factory and takes a personal interest in all his employees. Upon going his usual rounds, he comes upon Jose Diaz, a workman, infringing a strict rule of the works by smoking during working hours. Although a valued workman, Jose is at once dismissed from his employment, and in leaving, in his rage he swears to be revenged upon his employer, Jaime Huelva, who is manager of the factory, leading a double life, and besides being hopelessly in debt, he is in love with a woman who goads him to madness by taunting him with his poverty, declaring that she could never marry a poor man. In the counting house with his employer, the handling of a large sum of money that his employer is taking home with him, rouses his cupidity, and he at once schemes to become possessed of it. The unfortunate Jose, owing to his dismissal from the factory, gives way to drink, and on his way home in a hopeless condition, he stumbles on the road and picks up a whip which he carries triumphantly home with him. His wife is horrified to find him covered with blood, and he throws himself upon the couch and sinks into a drunken sleep. The next morning the papers are full of an account of the murder of the factory owner. The police investigate the case and at once suspect Jose owing to his threats against his employer the previous day. They enter his house and find him still asleep, with the marks of blood dried upon his clothes. They wake him up, but he cannot give a satisfactory account of his movements upon the previous night, and is at once arrested. The whip proves to have been used in committing the murder, traces of blood being found upon the butt end. No one has seen the murder committed, and Jose is condemned upon the circumstantial evidence against him. A barrister, named Maryston, takes a strong interest in the case and firmly believes in the innocence of Jose. He is appointed a magistrate and at once sets to work to unravel the mystery.

He visits the post office to send away a telegram when Huelva enters to write a letter, the impression of which he leaves on the blotting pad. Maryston reads the message which is to Huelva's sweetheart, telling her that he has at last come into money and can marry her, asking her to come and see him. Maryston knows Huelva is employed at the factory, and determines to watch him. He traces him to his flat, and then watches him come out with a bundle under his arm, which he is evidently intent upon secretly disposing of. Huelva enters a car and places his bundle on a chair. Maryston follows him and at once makes off with the bundle with Huelva after him. Maryston finds the bundle to contain blood-stained clothing, which at once confirms his opinion that Huelva is the murderer. He goes to the scene of the crime and finds traces of a larger boot than that worn by Jose, and takes a sketch of it. His next move is to measure the boot worn by Huelva. This he does by disguising himself as a bootblack and following Huelva to a low public house, where he meets with boon companions. Maryston is allowed to clean Huelva's boots and contrives to take a measurement, but does it so clumsily that Huelva suspects him, and with the help of his companions they overpower Maryston, tear off his disguise, and then carry him bound, into the cellar, where they set fire to a quantity of hay and rubbish and leave the unfortunate Maryston to burn to death.

Two detectives have arranged to meet Maryston at the inn, and arrive just as Huelva and his companions have left Maryston to his fate. They trace him to the cellar, and release him from his perilous position, and then the three plan to capture Huelva and charge him with the murder of the factory owner. Then follows a determined hunting down of the suspected murderer, who, knowing the detectives are on his track, resorts to various clever disguises to escape his pursuers. He receives a note purporting to be from his fiancee making an appointment. He suspects it to be a trap, but keeps the appointment in disguise, and finds the detectives waiting for him. He secures a light for his cigarette from one of them, and drops a note on the table before he moves leisurely away. Maryston arrives, discovers the note and is chagrined to find that Huelva has discovered the trap laid for him. They make after Huelva, and a motor chase ends in Huelva leaving his car and endeavoring to escape down a railway enbankment. The detectives intercept him and after a determined struggle Huelva is captured and carried before the magistrates, where he confesses to being the murderer. Jose is liberated and restored to his family, while Huelva pays the penalty for his crime.

IMP.

THE MILITANT (3 parts—Jan. 12).—Sir Arthur Braham and his wife have been happily married for about five years, during the last two of which, however, he has become so engrossed in political affairs that he has almost entirely neglected her. Wearying of the ordinary routine of society, the wife turns eagerly to the new cause—Woman Suffrage.

Cecil Tudor, a professed believer in the cause and a political rival of Sir Arthur, has been trying to force his attentions upon Sir Arthur's wife. Cecil realizes that if he could make it appear that Sir Arthur is secretly in league with the militants he would defeat him at the polls. Sir Arthur has been bitter toward the women's cause and they fall easily into a plan to wreck his political career.

The destruction of a series of warehouses is the first step in their plan. They aim to throw the city and country into a state of famine. Their next step is to kidnap Sir Arthur's child. This is done without the knowledge of his wife. The life of the child is threatened by Cecil unless Sir Arthur signs a certain bill advocating the Cause. When the wife discovers the loss of her child she turns against her allies and pleads for its return. They refuse, believing the Cause more important, and in order to push their purposes they make a prisoner of her. Sir Arthur, now aroused, turns Scotland Yard on the search. The baby is rescued, and, after many thrilling events, a reconciliation is brought about between husband and wife.

ECLAIR.

THE FIRST NUGGET (2 parts—Jan. 14).—John Boyed, a wealthy mine owner, gives a dinner in celebration of his tenth wedding anniversary. Called upon, he proceeds to tell the story of the first nugget he ever found and which led to his present wealth.

"I was," says Boyed, "at that time in the Service. Returning home from a leave I stumbled on a curious skull. On examining it I was astonished to find a pure gold nugget imbedded securely in the skull. Shortly after this my brother, the proverbial black sheep of the family, broke in on me demanding money. My sweetheart was present. Immediately after this, a pest broke out among the Indians and I was called back North. Constance begged to go with me, so we were married without delay and left. Arriving among the Indians we found the sick and dying were driven out to the well, to creep away and die. In my capacity of doctor I took immediate charge of the sufferers, but it was a terrible task."

Continuing, Boyed tells of the fight he had made to save a brave; of the fight his wife had made to save an old squaw and the story this old squaw related of two brothers who many years previous had found gold on the very spot on which she lay; of their mistrust of each other and their final death. He relates how his wife paid little attention to the story at the time; how they continued the struggle among the sick Indians and the lasting gratitude they won from this same old squaw and the brave. The brother appeared again and abused the young wife and the Indian killed him. Through the many hardships and thrilling escapades the Indians stood by them as guardian angles, the brave finally sacrificing his life for their safety in a spectacular river rescue.

"When the spring came," continued he, "my wife, saddened at the events which had happened, begged me to leave the place. While strolling about one day we came to the place where the old squaw had told her story. Curiously prying about I unearthed the knife and pistol and digging further came upon a rough map showing where the rich vein of gold, which the two brothers had discovered, was. The next day I departed for the place and found the gold which made me a man of wealth and fortune, and returned home to civilization, filled with intermingled thoughts of pleasure and regrets of the cold North.

SHE WROTE A PLAY (Jan. 18).—Miss Botch, a maid of ancient vintage, writes a play and carries it to the manager. She reads on for an hour and then finds that her audience has gone to sleep. It is no use. She takes it to the 10, 20, and 30 office and reads it. After listening for an hour they toss her out the window. She lands on a telephone pole, and is saved by her maid with a rope. Nothing daunted, she goes to a vaudeville manager and is promptly given the book. She then makes her play into a motion picture scenario. The Eclair studio is shown. She reads it to the director and he takes it for a comedy instead of a tragedy. But before the play continues Miss Botch is again sent to the street. Thus the difficulties continue. She lands into trouble with the policeman and with a suffragette and finally lands in a meeting of the Ladies Crazy Wuit Asylum. They accept her play, but before finishing are attacked by a stream of water from a well directed hose.

JUST MOTHER (Jan. 12).—A publisher advertises a prize of $500 for the best short story devoted to "Mother" in her home life. The advertisement reaches a family composed of a mother and two grown daughters. The daughters have dreams of social conquests and are interested in literary work. Both write and submit manuscripts to the publisher. The young ladies become acquainted with the publisher's sons and a double love affair springs up.

The mother, unknown to her daughters, writes the story of her life and submits it in the contest. The publisher's sons call on the daughters, and the girls appear ashamed of their mother with her old fashioned clothes and manners. The old lady though deeply hurt, says nothing.

Meanwhile the publisher reads the mother's simple story. He reads between the lines and comes to see that she is the kind of woman he could love. The mother wins the contest and the publisher's heart. The vain glory of the daughters is forever cured. All are married happily.

TRUST BEGETS TRUST (Jan. 16).—Marx, the crook, is trapped by the police when he meets Alexander. Alexander throws the police off the track and then explains a scheme whereby with his aid Marx can be made mayor of a small town within a year. Marx accepts the proposition. A year later finds Marx leading a new life. He is a respected citizen and mayor of the town. He has also won the love of a good woman and his fortune has reached the quarter-million mark. At the height of his prosperity Alexander appears and demands that Marx split with him. Marx tells his erstwhile companion that he would rather go to jail than return to his old life of crime.

The following morning Alexander tells Marx that he must return to New York with him. Marx demurs, but Alexander overcomes his objections and accompanies him to the metropolis. The two men are next seen at an exclusive club where Alexander introduces his friend as "The notorious crook, Marx." Alexander then explains that he has wagered at the club that he could reform the criminal, Marx, within two years. Marx now acknowledges that he owes Alexander everything and assures him that he need not fear for his future.

MICHAEL ARNOLD AND DR. LYNN (2 parts—Jan. 15).—Michael Arnold married the woman he loved against the wishes of his father and was disinherited. When the story opens he is found in his shop plying the trade of violin maker.

Dr. Lynn was the tool of fate: he was morally weak and when circumstantial evidence threatened to incriminate him he craftily shifted the evidence onto the son of his life-long friend's son, Michael. Dr. Lynn had attempted freedom with Michael's wife and then, to ease his conscience, had forced money upon her. Michael observed the action from a distance and misinterpreted his wife's motives. He went to Dr. Lynn's office; there were hot words and blows and in the confusion a violin neck which Michael carried in his pocket, was left in the doctor's office.

Dr. Lynn had been attending Michael's old father in his last sickness. The old father died in a way that promised to compromise the good name of the doctor and so he shifted the blame, prompted perhaps by his enmity, upon Michael. He helps to accomplish this by use of the violin neck, which he leaves under the window of the old man covered with blood. This brings us up to the most heart-rending, pathetic situations of the play, the tearing away of the boy from the bedside of his young wife, who has just given birth to a child. Michael faces trial and is convicted on circumstantial evidence to life imprisonment.

Ten years pass. Lynn is found in the mountains living the life of a hermit, suffering for his crime. He carries always in his pocket a document confessing the particulars of Michael's conviction. Michael escapes and is pursued by the guards. While hiding in the mountains he finds Lynn's hut and recognizes him by the name he sees on a suitcase. They grapple with each other. The guards approach and fire. The bullet finds it mark in Lynn. They find the confession in his pocket and Michael is liberated to return to his family.

THE OPTION (Jan. 18).—When Edith, living in the country, learns that her mother must go South for the winter as the only means of saving her life, she writes to her sister that she is coming to the city to look for work. As she leaves, her sweetheart gives her a revolver, with instructions to use it on city fellows who might try to get fresh. In the meantime, her sister Helen is struggling in the city as a stenographer. Her employer, Manning, makes overtures to her and she continues to fight him off. She is crestfallen when she receives Edith's letter, telling of her mother's ill health and of the money necessary to send her away. Manning reads this letter and tempts the girl with a check. She resists and later, in the course of her work, she writes a letter to the effect that a certain option that can be bought for $500 will save the company $80,000. Deceiving Manning with her smiles, she gets the check.

Edith has arrived and is waiting in the adjoining room. Helen gives her the money, with instructions to buy the option. Manning overhears and tries to interfere, but Helen holds him at bay with her sister's gun while the latter goes on the errand. When Edith returns she finds Helen in a faint on the floor and Manning about to secure the document when Hull, who sold the option, enters and takes the girls under his protection.

A few months finds the two girls with their mother comfortably settled. Helen receives word from Hull that the option has been sold for $10,000 and that Manning has been paid the $500 which had been borrowed.

CRYSTAL.

IT MAY COME TO THIS (Jan. 13).—Hubby cooks the breakfast while wife reads the morning newspaper, before going to the office. She complains at his cooking and hubby cries. She arrives at the office and fires her stenographer for coming in late, disregarding his plea that his wife was sick. She hires a new stenographer and then proceeds to fall in love with him. On the following day the husband calls at the office and observes the mad flirtation between his wife and her stenographer and again he sheds tears, with the result that she kicks him out of the office, explaining to the stenographer that he is her tailor.

That night wife is late in getting home. On the day following hubby again visits the office and observes the flirtation. He rushes to the station and brings a cop—a husky maid. When she enters she recognizes the stenographer as her husband and drags him off home, while hubby cries at his wife's duplicity and is only calmed after she promises to be good.

BALDY BELMONT'S BUMPS (Jan. 13).—Baldy is a traveling salesman. He goes away on business while his wife remains behind to become lonesome. She wants him to return home and writes a note to that effect. The boy she sends to the telegraph office with him hasn't enough to pay for it and so strikes out the last three words. Belmont gets the message and interprets it to mean that his wife is dying. In wild haste he tries to reach her. He hires a special train and then misses it. He jumps on a wagon and is thrown off. He rides a motorcycle and is half killed. After trying devious ways and methods he arrives at his destination only to find his spouse healthy and happy at his return. Baldy demands an explanation and when she denies having sent the message Baldy faints away.

A FATHER'S DEVOTION (Jan. 18).—When she returns home with her poor husband, William, her rich father disowns her. Several years later William finds himself alone except for a baby girl, his wife having died. Meanwhile the father, Dumont, has softened somewhat, and writes William, asking to take care of the child. He stipulates, however, that William must never come to visit her.

William consents after careful thought, believing the old man can give her the education and comfort that he would be unable to. Time passes and the girl, now grown, becomes a fixture of the old man's household. She becomes attached to a young man, who asks to marry her. Meanwhile William has become lonesome for a sight of his child and decides to risk all visiting her. He arrives when the girl is in conversation with her lover. The butler sees William and mistakes him for a burglar. Dumont rushes out and accuses him. The girl observes and believing that her father needs her more than anyone, breaks her engagement. Her sweetheart, however, follows her, telling her that he would marry her despite her poverty, and all ends happily.

FRONTIER.

SLIM AND THE MONEY POT (Jan. 15).—Slim and Molly, chore boy and girl on the ranch, are sweethearts, but too poor to wed. After being driven away from the ranch by Mrs. Burley, owner, Slim, sleepy as usual, takes a nap and dreams. He imagines that he sees two outlaws bury a pot full of greenbacks. He steals the money, rides madly back to the ranch and buries it, much to the surprise of the owner, and then with a few words takes Molly to town for a wedding.

Before taking his bride to the feast, however, he buys an auto and rides madly about the town fairly distributing money by the handfuls. At the feast Slim's rude table manners are noticed and turn the joy of the bride and guests to disgust. During the dance that follows the two outlaws suddenly appear and drag Slim off to where he had stolen their money. A posse attack them and capture Slim, while the outlaws make their escape. Slim bribes one of the posse and he is released, only to be captured again by the outlaws, and the mixup continues with lively fights. Slim awakes and finds his mistake: he finds solace in the caresses of Molly, the slavey.

is an inscription to the effect that the boy is her brother, that he was stolen by the Indians when but a child and that a prominent scar on his hand is the only mark by which he might be recognized.

Rattler Joe is a notorious bandit in the county of which Baldwin is sheriff. Joe goes to the Baldwin cabin during Ray's absence. Ethel by a ruse, shoves him into a small closet and locks the door. She tries to escape as Joe starts breaking down the door and his left arm comes through the panel. Ethel seizes an axe and is about to strike when a scar on the bandit's arm catches her eye. She recognizes it as that of her brother; she brings him from the closet and shows him the picture.

Ray returns home. He sees them through a window. Joe is about to shoot when Ethel stops him with the information that Ray is her husband. Joe escapes. Ray enters and bitterly accuses his wife and then leaves. Later, Baldwin pursues Joe into the hills. By an ambush Joe captures Baldwin. They are attacked by Indians and both of Joe's arms are shot. Baldwin takes him to his cabin and his wife, where he learns the truth; that the bandit is the brother of his wife.

NESTOR.

THE INTRUDER (Jan. 14).—Much to the delight of the simple old father, his daughter becomes engaged to a big-hearted mountaineer. He builds their hut in the wilderness, and she is happy, though she often dreams of the great world outside. Then comes the intruder from the city, a man of the world. He obtains board at the girl's home. He blinds her eyes to the beautiful things of the woods with his talk of pretty places and things of the great world without. He tempts and wins her away from the big-hearted backwoodsman. The young mountaineer, who has been working on his cabin, returns and finds the old man dozing and the girl gone.

The simple girl soon discovers the brute beneath the polished exterior of the intruder. She tries to elude him. In this predicament, the mountaineer catches up with the couple. He shoots the intruder, wounding him slightly. He takes the repentant girl back to her mountain home and the little cabin he has built for her in the woods.

CUPID'S CLOSE SHAVE (Jan. 16).—Billings is the only barber in a small town. He hires Sudds as an assistant. Without any delay Sudds and Mamie, Billings' daughter, fall in love. Sudds courts her unknown to the father. When Sudds asks Billings for his daughter's hand he is discharged without ceremony. Sudds is left a little money by the death of a relative, and as a matter of revenge he decides to break Billings up in business if he continues to disfavor his suit. Sudds sets up an opposition shop across the road from Billings. He reduces the price of a shave and Billings meets it. Honors are about even in the contest until Sudds gets a woman barber, then Billings' shop is deserted. Billings also gets a woman barber, a man-hating old maid, who would rather cut a man's throat than eat breakfast. Billings realizes that he is beaten. He puts out a white flag and goes across the street to Sudds' shop. Then he sees Sudds has all the trade. His own daughter is the drawing card.

JOKER.

SAVING THE CHILD (Jan. 14).—Hist! the villain and his evil cohorts peer through the window. The baby in the cradle has inherited a small fortune, and is now amusing itself by throwing bean bags at its mother. The villain creeps through the window, and, overpowering the fond mother, demands: "Give us a million dollars or we will kidnap your child." The mother swoons. The light is smashed and the baby is stolen. Padlock Bones, detective, protector of innocence at reasonable rates, hears his telephone tinkle. He disguises and answers it. A few moments later the distracted mother reports the larceny of her offspring to him. He again disguises himself, and exits with the woman through a trap door in the floor. Once upon the scene of the crime, Padlock gets busy. By means of a powerful microscope, he discovers a string of lima beans leading from the room. He follows. The villain and his gang are in a saloon drinking, when they see at the window Padlock Bones examining them with a telescope. They hide the baby in a beer barrel and fortify themselves in an adjoining room. Padlock enters and the bartender attempts to poison him. The detective pours the beer into his hat and pretends sleep. The villain sneaks up and stabs him in the boot. Padlock then replaces his foot in the boot. The villain again steals in and sinks a hatchet in his arm. Padlock removes the hatchet from a false arm. The police and the mother arrive. Padlock throws aside his disguise and announces: "The child is in yon barrel asleep."

THE MYSTERY OF A TAXICAB (Jan. 17).—Much to the chagrin of the other women of the harem, the sultan chooses the beautiful Squabina, his favorite, as an agent to go to the United States and steal the government secret code. Squabina is placed in a barrel by the prime minister. However, before nailing up the barrel he accidentally drops a few moth balls into it. Squabina is shipped in the barrel to the ambassador in the United States. Immediately Squabina is unpacked, United States secret service sleuths get on the trail. The first bit of a clue is the smell of moth ball and they follow this lead. Squabina is repacked and labeled "Grape Juice" and sent to the Secretary of State. Squabina succeeds in securing the secret code and escapes.

In the meantime the secret service men are following the scent of moth balls. They capture her and all get into a taxicab. However, Squabina is not to be outwitted. She changes places with a tramp, who is taken to police headquarters in her stead. The ambassador ships her back to Turkey and the secret code is delivered to the Sultan.

VICTOR.

THE IMP ABROAD (Jan. 12).—It is dull days in Hades. The only enjoyment of an imaginative Imp is to interview the newest arrivals from the earth. Finally, one poor soul who arrives to taste of damnation, brings with him a newspaper from the earth. The Imp reads the latest earth news, of wars, scandals, divorce and white slave traffic. The Imp longs to visit the planet where something is always doing. The Imp upon earth comes in contact with a ne'er-do-well barber, who is impersonating a Bourbon count in order to win the hand of an heiress. The Imp takes an informal interest in the business. The heiress and her parents are vain and care only for a title.

After the barber-count has been accepted by the heiress, the Imp introduces himself as a real duke of the realm, with unlimited estates and vassals. He makes love to the heiress, and shows her that he is a greater aristocrat than the count. They elope, and after a sensational chase, are overtaken by the girl's parents and the count. The Imp then resumes his devilish form, and has his laugh at the expense of the vain heiress.

THE ROMANCE OF A PHOTOGRAPH (2 parts—Jan. 16).—For the second time Flo is left alone with her burglar fiance. He takes the opportunity to again demand jewelry from her. She goes upstairs to get it, frightened. Matt, the man she turned down, has seen the burglar's picture in the papers and recognizes it. He comes to the house at this time to investigate. As he enters the parlor—the servants have all gone out for the evening—he overhears the conversation between the girl and the burglar. He intervenes and saves Flo from further fright and embarrassment.

This last escapade is far beyond even Flo's sense of humor and it has the desired effect of bringing her to her sober senses. The heroism of Matt completely captivates her and the wish of her folks that she marry him is blended with her own desires. She shamefacedly apologizes for her previous shabby treatment of him, and Matt, big heartedly, tells her he has forgotten and forgiven and asks her for her hand again. This time she readily consents.

BISON.

THE FLASH OF FATE (2 parts—Jan. 17).—During Clifford's first day's work as a mining engineer, at the mother lode mine on which he is to make a report, he comes upon a miner injured by a blast. Clifford discovers this fellow to be the father of Marie, his boyhood sweetheart. He meets her and, although they have long since ceased to love each other, they continue to be fast friends.

Failing to understand Val, the foreman at the mine and fiance of Marie, becomes jealous and the jealous passion finally fanned into flame, there is a quarrel. In defending himself, Clifford is forced to shoot Val. The foreman's friends accused Clifford of trying to murder Val and to save himself from the hasty verdict flees to the mountains.

It is here that he meets Phyllis, a nurse, hurrying to the bedside of the wounded man. Phyllis has been lost. Clifford risks all to take her on to camp, and later he tells her that he is the man who did the shooting. Before making his escape again he instructs her to signal to him by the flash of a mirror, if within three days the boy is alive. Following there is long days of watching and waiting and work and suspense. The signal is given and Clifford returns. Val, partly recovered, explains away the compromising circumstances and we leave them with two romances in progress, one well along and the other just started.

GOLD SEAL.

A WAR TIME REFORMATION (2 parts—Jan. 13).—"Reward of $500 for the capture of Dave Hart, dead or alive." This is the notice that young Dave read respecting himself as he stood in the crowded saloon in early spring of '61. When he finishes reading this notice about himself he turns to the bar, orders a drink and spins a yarn. But a sudden intense gleam flashes in his eyes. He is looking towards the door at the sheriff who holds a gun in his hands. Quick as the eye can register the action the outlaw throws a bottle at the lamp. The room is now in darkness for an instant. When the lamp is relighted the outlaw is gone, but upon the floor is a dead man—the mistake of the sheriff. Dave escapes to the mountains with the sheriff on his trail. There he meets the person who exercises such a potent influence on his future. Virginia is taken with him and when Dave saves her father from death over a precipice, she gives him her heart.

Six months later war is declared between the North and South. Virginia has gone to live with her aunt, while her father fights the Yankees. Dave tries to enlist with the South, but is seen by the sheriff, who orders his arrest. Dave exclaims that if he can't fight for their cause he'll fight against it and again makes a spectacular escape. He becomes a guerrilla chief and his command is hemmed in by the Union troops. Confederate soldiers attack and in the confusion of battle, Dave escapes and joins the Confederate ranks. Virginia's father is wounded and is carried to his daughter's house. The Confederates are driven back and Union soldiers take charge of the house. Virginia is hiding her father in her bedroom. Dave goes in the rear door of the house to get something to eat. Virginia enters and recognizes Dave, who now wears a Confederate uniform. She hides him in her room with her father.

All the Union soldiers leave except one and he remains to make advances to the girl. He finds her father's coat and prepares to give the alarm. Virginia snatches the soldier's gun and shoots him. She replaces the gun in the holster as the officers and soldiers rush in.

Dave has been listening at the door. He commands the girl's father to escape through the window. The soldier Virginia has wounded tells his companions that the girl has a Confederate soldier hidden in the house. Dave enters and tells them that he is the man and that he shot the soldier. He then makes a last desperate effort to escape, but the odds are too many and he is shot down—dying in the girl's arms a redeemed man.

APOLLO.

THE TALE OF A SHIRT (Jan. 4).—Baron Nuisance accompanied by his valet, Bud Duncan, arrive at the hotel, where they are given the best suite in the place. The baron, preferring the air rather than stopping in a close room, soon decides to go out for his afternoon walk, leaving Bud in charge of the suite. Bud, on the other hand, does love to be quiet, so naturally becomes riled when the nice looking maid calls with more linen prior to her leaving for the afternoon.

During the afternoon the baron meets what he thinks is a society girl, but later proves to be the chambermaid. When time comes for the parting, he insists on taking his friend home, but she declines his request and the only consolation he can get is her name and address, which he writes on his cuff. The baron arrives home very tired from the afternoon's excitement; his valet is awaiting him. He is put to bed to await his evening engagement, but while he sleeps his valet sends his laundry away, including the shirt with the girl's address on the cuff.

When the baron finds the address and the shirt gone, he and his valet start in a hurried chase for the shirt. They first come to a laundry wagon, which they put to shame. Finding nothing but soiled linen they go to a near-by Chinese laundry and cannot make the Chinaman understand their wants, so they proceed to hunt on their own accord. During the excitement the Chinamen are given a rough deal. They call in the police force, who meet with many accidents while the baron and Bud are wrecking the laundry. Finally the police force get on the job, but just at the same time the baron and Fred have run out of ammunition, so they resort to some starch buckets which the police receive in the face. In the battle the baron is hit in the eye with his own shirt, which he quickly notices. He and Bud soon desert the place for the address on the cuff. The cops give chase.

The boys think they can get free by crawling up under a bridge spanning the river and beat the cops to the other side; but the cops find a short way over and decide to meet them half way. They do and there comes the downfall. The boys hide behind the posts and as the cops pass they push them out. After all the cops have fallen Bud and the baron are looking on with amusement, when they lose their balance and join the others, where they are taken captives.

A CIRCUMSTANTIAL NURSE (Jan. 9).—Tom, jailed for another's crime, is discharged because of his record. He goes home. An appeal to a doctor results in failure, and, discouraged, he plans to rob his employer's home to get money for medicine for his sick daughter. His employer and wife go out, leaving the maid with Helen, his little daughter. The maid has a date with her beau, and leaves the baby asleep. Tom enters with intent to rob, but finds Helen, sick, and stays to nurse her. Helen's parents return unexpectedly, and find Tom nursing Helen. Over the bedside of their sick daughter, they realize a man was born, and they paid the price.

MAJESTIC.

MOLLIE AND THE OIL KING (Jan. 4).—John Bradford, millionaire oil man, in order to freeze out small competitors, decides to secure rebates from the railroads in order that he may undersell them. He secures the rebate from the railroad and starts to crush competition.

Mollie Rainey, the daughter of a small operator, in order to save her father, secures a position as stenographer in Bradford's office, intending to secure evidence against him if possible. Meanwhile, she falls in love with Bradford, but despite her affection for him she determines to secure evidence of the rebate arrangement so as to save her father from ruin. She succeeds in getting possession of the needed document, but is detected by Bradford, and is denounced for her action. To his surprise, he learns that she is the daughter of one of the oil men he had determined to crush.

Mollie returns to her home disheartened, but the young oil king cannot forget her, and determines to redeem himself in her eyes. He forces his associates to repudiate the rebate arrangements, and Rainey is notified by his customers that they will continue to deal with him as in the past. The Raineys, grateful to Bradford for his generosity, regard him in a far different manner, and he wins Mollie's consent to become his bride.

THE TEN OF SPADES (Jan. 6).—Jess was a waif, she just came into the camp one day. Nancy, of the "dance hall," saw marks of coming beauty in the child and befriended her and guarded her closely. After three years of Nancy's care and training, Jess was graceful and pretty and had been so carefully watched that she was a stranger almost in camp. Nancy decides to have her enter the "dance hall," and to that effect makes a trade with Mike Finney, the proprietor. Jess is brought to the "hall" to dance just after Ralph West had come into the camp and entered the "hall." He, a stranger, sits apart not interested until Nancy appears with the unwilling Jess. Struck by the girl's timidity and modesty, so unlike the other dance hall girls, he watches closely as she dances with her castanets. When the floor is cleared he sees her shrink from the rude applause, and appear even more frightened when a miner, Barry, by name, draws her to a table and orders drinks. She searches the crowd for one kindly, understanding face, sees Ralph West, and mutely appeals for help. He instantly arises. Seeking the proprietor, he demands the reason of the girl's presence. Blustering Mike Finney tells him she is Nancy's protege. West offers to buy her release, and finally does, after agreeing to pay double the sum Finney paid Nancy. West comes in time to save Jess from insult. Barry is knocked down, and Jess passes out of the hall forever, for under the guidance of the rector, whom they meet on the street, Jess finds a home with Katie O'Brian, the stage driver's wife. Ralph West stakes out a claim and befriends Jess in many ways, besides teaching her to read. Jess grows to love Ralph.

Jess tries to tell her fortune with cards; the fortune is not good. As she gathers up the cards she remembers that she had heard that a fortune told with cards in the middle of a new bridge at midnight will come true. Jess resolves to go that night to the new bridge and try her luck. She goes, and sorts the cards. She is the queen of hearts, the "prospector" the king of hearts. The cards are dealt, she strikes a match and looks—the ten of spades is between the king and queen of hearts. A shadow falls on her face, slowly she picks up the cards, and goes on her way towards home. Hearing voices, she steps to one side and hides while the miner, Barry and another man approach and pause near her place of concealment. Jess hears them plan to kill West next day. Frightened, she makes her way home. Next day she warns Ralph West, who laughs at her fears. Yet alarmed for his safety, unseen watches near him. She sees Barry approach stealthily, and in her attempt to save Ralph West, Jess received the bullet intended for him. Ralph shoots Barry and tenderly lifts the wounded girl. She is carried home. The wound is fatal. The rector prays and Katie O'Brian weeps while Ralph West supports the dying girl. Jess takes the three cards from her bosom; the queen of hearts and ten of spades are bullet marked, blood stained, the king untouched. She tells them the ten of spades meant death for one of them; he had a mother waiting for him, that she didn't count; she was "nobody's child." She asks Ralph to kiss her, points upward, smiles, and is gone.

SORORIETY INITIATION (Jan. 10).—The girls of the Riverdale Seminary for young ladies were of a naturally good disposition, but they were affected, to a certain degree, by the opinions of the world, and when they heard that Mary Adair, whose father was a convicted embezzler, was to be a pupil of the school, their indignation was great. Only the influence of Ruth Graham, the most popular girl in the school, prevented an open outbreak, but the influence of her generous personality prevailed, and the school, though inwardly raging, welcomed the newcomer with at least a semblance of cordiality.

As the weeks passed Mary Adair clung more and more to Ruth, whom she instinctively felt was her friend. She showed her the letters she received from her father, confined in a distant prison, and Ruth read the prisoner's declarations of innocence, and grew to believe that possibly justice had miscarried.

A sororiety had been established by the girls of the school, and Ruth, now a member of the senior class, applied for admission. After an elaborate initiation, it was decreed that she spend the night in the "haunted house," a deserted residence which had been unoccupied for years. Ruth pluckily complied, and eluding the vigilance of the school officials, entered the house, and with many shudders, waited for the coming of day.

Two other persons came to the "haunted house" that night. They had no idea that there was anyone else in the place, but the plucky girl overheard their conversation, and what she learned enabled her to clear the name of John Adair, and bring happiness once more to Mary, by restoring her to the father she loved.

THANHOUSER.

MRS. PINKHURST'S PROXY (Jan. 4).—The women's society in a little Western town decided to show how powerful they were by engaging Mrs. Pinkhurst, a noted foreign reformer, to deliver a lecture in their town hall, for which they promised to pay $500. At the last moment Mrs. Pinkhurst sent word that she would be unable to fulfill the engagement, but the telegram was lost by a careless messenger boy, and the women did not know that their star attraction had been side-tracked. The telegram was found by a tramp, who had read about Mrs. Pinkhurst in the papers, and knew of the $500. He decided to substitute himself as the great reformer, secured the necessary disguise, and made a very impressive speech. The $500 was just in his grasp when officers arrested him. It appears that Mrs. Pinkhurst was still abroad and that she had been impersonated by a clever bank embezzler. This man dropped the personation just in time, and the unfortunate tramp picked it up at the wrong moment.

THE RUNAWAY PRINCESS (Jan. 6).—The Princess Priscilla of Rurilia, was a refined and dainty young woman, and had never worried about love or sweethearts. It came as a shock to her when her uncle, who presided over the small country, announced that she was to marry Prince Wilhelm of Ogram, one of their neighbors. Perhaps the princess might have acquiesced had it not been that she took a great dislike to Prince Wilhelm, a man of bad habits and a terrible reputation. Anyway, the princess told her uncle she would never marry the prince, and the king retorted in a way purely regal—he ordered his niece to remain a close prisoner in her rooms until she was prepared to obey his commands.

It never struck the king that the princess would run away, but that was precisely what she did. So, aided by her faithful nurse, they arrived in America in course of time, and as they had money and jewels, the problem of high cost of living did not bother them at first. At last their money did run out, and the old nurse, becoming sick, had to be removed to a hospital. The doctor who attended her was a kindly old man, and he secured the princess a job as maid in the home of a wealthy family, never suspecting that she was of royal

JUST PLAIN COMMON SENSE tells you—When you want to SEE yourself you use a Mirror. Because you SEE yourself better with a Mirror than any other means in the world. Now the same thing applies. When you want to SEE motion pictures, use a MIRROR SCREEN. Because you SEE the pictures so much plainer, better and clearer on a Mirror Screen than on any other surface under the sun. Besides it tickles your patrons and makes picture fans. It's a fact. The difference between a motion picture on a MIRROR SCREEN and any other screen of any other kind is the same comparison between seeing your own reflection in a fine French plate glass mirror and in a mud puddle. The "MIRROR SCREEN" is a Mirror. blood. The real man arrived in the shape of the wealthy brother of the mistress. He fell violently in love with the maid and proposed to marry her, but at first she coyly refused him. Womanlike, she wanted to appear her best on such an occasion, and her chance came. The minister from Ruralia called upon the mistress of the princess, and to his surprise met one of his royal house in servant's garb. The princess induced him to keep her secret, and also to get an invitation for her to the ball, which was to be given at the house. There the princess appeared in all her splendor. The diplomat accompanying her expected that she would announce her intention of returning to her home; to his surprise, however, she took this occasion to accept her lover, remarking that she preferred an honest man's love to a throne.

AMERICAN.

DESTINIES FULFILLED (Three parts—Jan. 12).—Back in '65 there was an old Southern fire eater, Pennington, and his daughter, Lucille, fell in love with Carr, who was then a lieutenant in the small Yankee force that arrived in their city at the base of the mountains. When the confederacy fell, Pennington fled into the mountains with his daughter, rather than submit and there buried himself in the same place where Carr now lived with Rosemary. Several years passed and Lucille did not forget Carr, her Yankee lover. It was then that fate brought them together and old Pennington finally consented to the marriage, exacting a promise from Carr, not to take Lucille away from him and her mountain home. But with the birth of her daughter, Rosemary, there came death to Lucille. The shock proved too much to the already weakened heart of the old man, and the double tragedy resulted in the weakening of Carr's mind. Thus the storekeeper tells of Rosemary and her father.

Rosemary has a lover in Luke, a rough looking mountaineer, and he views the advent of Frank with suspicion. When Frank follows Rosemary and wins her love in a pretty nook of the stream, Luke is an unseen witness, and hurries to persuade Carr that Frank seeks to take Rosemary away from him and the mountains. But Rosemary, frightened at the strange flurry in her heart, fled to her home in the woods and Frank, following, escapes Carr and the jealous Luke. At the house, Rosemary, seeking to make herself attractive for this new lover of hers, remembers an old trunk containing the clothes of the mother she has never seen. There are many of us who think that the girls of our mother's time or our grandmother's time, were sweeter than the girls of today. At any rate, when Rosemary, brought up in the atmosphere of fifty years ago, and preserved in the mountains from contact of the outside world, unearths her mother's clothes, Frank finds in her indeed, a girl of the sixties. She finally consents to elope with Frank, as the effect of the sight of her in her mother's clothes upon her father, badly frightens her and she and Frank succeed in eluding Luke and the now wildly crazed Carr.

Rosemary, however, is not meant for city life or modern life, and there comes a longing for the mountains. Luke has persuaded Carr to go to the city with him to wreak vengeance on Frank, but his plan miscarries, because the sight of Uncle Sam's uniform carries the mind of Carr back to his own days in the army and restores his memory, so that he no longer concurs in the plans of Luke. When Frank realizes the longings of Rosemary and takes her back to the mountains, Luke quickly takes advantage of the opportunity to be avenged upon Frank, but Carr, now in his right mind, disposes of Luke for once and for all. Frank and Rosemary, in the old nook at the stream, find that the renewal of love is very sweet.

UNTO THE WEAK (Jan. 17).—Alone at the edge of the village, and not far from the mill race and the old bridge, lived Peter—his last name is of no consequence. With aid for the needy and a helping hand for the weak, it was not unusual when he took into his lonely home, Eleen, a young girl, and her baby, when others had cast her out. The name of her lover the girl refused to tell—so Peter merely waited.

But the next door neighbor misunderstood and the news that Peter was sheltering "that girl," soon spread. Peter's pastor, the Rev. Tallett, a good, sincere man, with a son about twenty, came to see Peter and to tell him that his action was not approved of in the village. But Peter sent the Rev. Tallett about his business, for he knew that his actions were far more Christ-like than those of the man who stones the weak. And he took down his old gun and cleaned it carefully, for he felt that he might need it. And it so happened that he did, for the fact was disclosed to him that Eleen's lover was no other than Henry, the Rev. Tallett's only son.

Then the gun did come into service, for Peter marched the young man to his father's door and there forced the shocked father to marry his only son to Eleen. Then, of course, the village approved of Peter's actions. But Peter didn't care one way or the other. But in the bottom of his heart he knew that he had done right, in giving a word of sympathy instead of a sermon, and blotting out a share of the sorrow of this world.

RELIANCE.

THE LOAFER (Jan. 7).—Tom Burns, a good-for-nothing young loafer, refuses to work, and spends his time among bad companions. He really loves his old mother, who takes in washing for a living for them both. He does not work, however, and when his mother needs him to do something for her he goes on his way with his bad pals and it remains for Dr. Fox to help the old woman. He does not know her at all, but his love for his own mother makes him considerate of other people's mothers.

Dr. Fox remonstrates with Burns and is forced to punish him. When his companions twit Burns about the doctor's superiority, Burns determines to get even. Taking a club he goes after him and sees him leave his home, bidding an affectionate farewell to his own mother. Burns follows and sees him taking care of his old mother. The sight of a stranger doing the things that he ought to do awakens his self-respect and leads to a change of life that makes him a real man and a worthy son.

THE SACRIFICE (Jan. 10).—Jane Dale is supporting her sick sister and is told that she must take her West to keep her alive. She is working at a store where she receives a bonus for extra work and with this and her savings plans to send the sick sister away. That night a tramp sees her hide the money and breaks in and steals it. The girls are now in dire straits, as the well sister loses her position. A young policeman is attracted to her and aims to help her by loaning her money, but his method of offering it angers her and she refuses to accept it. He leaves her deeply offended.

The man Jane works for has insulted her and she has lost her position on that account. Seeing her sister growing steadily worse all the time, she writes him that she will reconsider his proposition and comes back to work for him. The sick sister reads the letter and rather than have her sister make such a sacrifice even to save her life, she attempts to end both their lives by gas. The policeman repents of his hasty anger and returns in time to save them both and send the sister out West, where she can regain her health.

PRINCE (Jan 2).—An order forbidding the keeping of pets or mascots is issued by the chief of the fire department, and Prince, a dog which has become a great favorite with the men of the department, is raffled, that being the easiest way out of the difficulty, for every man in the department was anxious to take the dog home. The dog is won by Dick Gordon, much to the delight of Mildred, his little daughter, and very much against the will of his wife.

While at the ironing-board a few days later, Mrs. Gordon is called to the sick bed of a very dear friend, and in her excitement, leaves the hot iron on the ironing-board, which sets fire to the basket of clothes nearby. Mildred, who has been scolded and locked in the bed room for having fed the dog at the table, hears the dog pawing at the door, but is unable to let herself out. She finally sees and smells smoke as it comes under the door, and realizing that the house is afire, goes to the window. It is barred and she is unable to get out. The dog goes to the firehouse and calls the men to the fire. Mildred is rescued, but not until she had been badly burned.

NARCOTIC SPECTRE (2 parts—Jan. 9).—Colonel Warren, on his way to take up a position as commander of a Western fort, meets Mabel Kerns, who is also going to the same place to visit a friend. The two fall in love. Colonel Warren has contracted the opium habit while on foreign duty in China. He tries to break it, but seems unable to do so. His orderly does everything possible to help him. Just previous to Colonel Warren's advent some miners have taken up a mining claim which they are working illegally. The Indians demand this claim which rightfully belongs to them. The miners continue with their work and store the gold in the powder magazine at the fort.

Mabel discovers that the colonel is an opium fiend and declares the ultimatum that he must either give up the habit or her. He tries very hard to give up the habit, but one day he gives way and during his dream thinks that the Indians attack and kill the miners. The troops are sent out from the fort and the Indians, learning of this, attack the fort from another direction. Just at the point of capturing the fort, the colonel rushes out, shows the white flag and makes the agreement with the Indians that he will give them the gold in the magazine and guarantee their rights to the mines if they allow the people in the fort to escape, he remaining as hostage. While showing them the bags of gold in the magazine, he touches a match to one of the powder cans, killing the Indians and himself, for he feels that he is not strong enough to overcome the habit. At this point he awakens. The dream has been so realistic that he takes the opium outfit and burns it up. Mabel and Shorty are overjoyed at this move.

TRUE IRISH HEARTS (Three parts—Jan. 1).—Danny Sullivan and Patrick O'Neill are both in love with the village beauty, Rose O'Farrell, a pretty little Irish girl, whose father is a gruff old fellow. Rose favors Danny and when Patrick proposes to her, she tells him she would marry him if she were not going to marry some one else. Patrick is broken-hearted and decides to go to Dublin to study for the priesthood. Danny and Rose are married by Father Donegal, the village priest and sponsor to Patrick.

Five years later, the "patriots" of Ireland, resenting the rule of England, decide to take matters into their own hands and Danny is chosen their leader. A reward is offered for the capture of Danny, and Felix McCann, who wanted to marry Danny's mother, because she owned a little land and a cottage, and was kicked out of the house by Danny, forges a note, purporting to come from Danny, who offers to betray his band if the British officer will give him freedom. Danny is about to be courtmartialed when Rose finds the notes thrown away by Felix when he was trying to imitate Dan's handwriting. Danny is restored to his place as leader. Fearing the wrath of a betrayed people, Felix confesses to Father Donegal and Patrick that it was he who told the British soldiers where they could find Dan. Dan and his men have a fierce fight at the tavern and Dan is captured and sentenced to death. Patrick visits Rose and touched by her grief, plans to save Danny at any cost, and help them to escape to America. He borrows a dress and shawl from Dan's mother and visits Dan in prison. He changes clothes with Dan, telling Dan he need not fear for him as they will not dare harm a priest. Dan and Rose, assisted by a couple of fishermen, escape to a ship leaving for America. The colonel, when he finds the ruse used by Patrick and Dan, is so angry that he condemns Patrick to be shot, unmindful of the fact that he is a priest, and at sunset of the day that Dan and Rose depart for America, Patrick, with a true Irish heart, sacrifices his life for the girl he loved when he was a boy.

THE HARP OF TARA (2 parts—Jan. 8).—Nora Egan, a pretty attractive Irish lassie, is very much in love with Rory O'Connor, who has aspirations for the priesthood. This situation worries Father Daly, the parish priest. Jim Macy, the bailiff, loves Nora, but she spurns him. Angered, he vows that unless the taxes are paid that Nora and her widowed mother shall be the first to be evicted from their home. Father Daly attempts to quiet the mob that has gathered around the notice of eviction of non-tax payers. The bailiff, with some English troops, starts evicting the Irish from their homes and a great fight takes place. Nora's mother is arrested and Nora, pursued and insulted by Jim, meets Rory, who gives him a good beating.

Father Daly arrives upon the scene of the fight and succeeds in stopping it until he can arbitrate matters. That evening, tired with his strenuous day, Father Daly falls asleep. He dreams that the English are attempting to evict the Irish from their homes, Rory is pursued and escapes into a cave where he finds the Harp of Tara, which, according to the legend, when found by a good man, shall prove the saving and freeing of Ireland. Rory takes the harp to the rectory just as the English are making a stand outside the church, where Father Daly has marshaled the Irish. Jim, unknown to Rory, has entered the rectory and while Nora is making love to Rory, seizes the harp and threatens to smash it unless Nora promises to become his wife. Father Daly begs her for the sake of Ireland to marry Rory, but Rory takes Nora in his arms. Angered, Jim smashes the harp. Father Daly awakens to find a messenger from the Mayor promising an extension of time.

take a stand for woman's rights. Mrs. Wimble takes up the work, much to the disgust of her husband and her father-in-law. John decides to break up the little game; he gives a large party, to which he invites James Murphy, a typical Eighth Ward heeler, announcing to the guests that Murphy is to be his wife's political partner. Mrs. Wimble becomes so disgusted with Murphy's attempt to sing and his table manners, that she leaves the table. The climax comes when she sees her cook and maid leading a suffragette parade, coming to her house to notify her she has been elected president of their club. She begs her husband to help her out of the mess and take her away. Mr. Wimble sends a note to the women telling them that Murphy will take his wife's place, and leaves with her and the baby through the back door, while the women are storming the front of the house.

CONSCIENCE (2 parts—Jan. 21).—Haggerty and Slade are burglar pals. Haggerty has just robbed a lady of her purse and jewelry and is pursued to the tenement house where he and Slade live. In escaping, Haggerty puts on the costume of a minister and leaves for the West, thus eluding the officers. Arrived in the mining town, Haggerty assumes the role of his garb and soon gains the confidence of the miners and to him they entrust the gold while awaiting shipment. He writes Slade to this effect telling him to come West and that they can make a big haul. Slade does so.

In the meantime, the Gray family, including the daughter, Mary, a very pretty girl, come to town and decide to locate. Haggerty falls in love with Mary, but on account of his past life, feels that he should not ask for her love. Slade arrives. Haggerty informs him that he has decided to reform and that he cannot steal the money. Slade threatens exposure and Haggerty finally relents, giving Slade the key to the chest which is hidden in a trap door in the floor. Just as Slade is trying to open the chest, Haggerty tries to recover the key. A fierce battle takes place in which Slade shoots Haggerty, and, thinking him dead, takes the money and departs. Haggerty, however, revives, calls for help and informs the miners of the robbery. The miners start in pursuit of Slade and finally kill him. Mary is informed of the injury of Haggerty and goes to his bedside, assisting in taking care of him.

SIMPLE SIMON'S HONEYMOON (Jan. 15).—One cannot help sympathizing with Simple Simon. He and his lovely bride deserved a better fate. For such an ingenious person one expected something less prosaic than the postillion-led carriage in which Simon chose to begin his tour. What followed deprives the critic of the chief weapon in his armory. One cannot pour ridicule upon an unfortunate couple under whom every conveyance they selected broke down. Chaise, cart and motor, all failed and it was not to be wondered at that the bride's dress basket was the last resort of the harassed couple. If the film does leave us in doubt as to their ultimate fate, they appeared to be happy in the basket as it gradually found its level in the rough sea. The film, too, is silent as to their destination, but they appeared to be happy, and seeing that the picture, full of riotous enjoyment, leaves the bridal couple happy, we need shed no tears.

TINY TIM AND THE FISHERMAN (Jan. 15).—Hard up and hungry, Tiny Tim accosted a fisherman, and sought assistance either in money or kind. The angler spurned the boy and went on his way full of hope. He hung his satchel to a tree and cast his line into the river. Sport, as usual, was disappointing, but there was that which cheered awaiting him, and the angler returned to fortify himself for the ordeal of the afternoon. But Tiny Tim had been before him and, while he raged and stormed, the boy was hidden away eating as he had not eaten for weeks. Next day the angler brought a dog with him. He enjoined upon doggie the need of closely guarding the satchel, and went to the river bank. When Tiny Tim came along the faithful hound rushed at him. Round and round the tree ran Tim, the dog following him, until the cord holding him was wound round the tree and the dog could no longer reach the bag.

DEAD MAN'S PAPERS (2 parts—Jan. 17).—Joe Colder falls ill and his unscrupulous manager, Snape, plans to make whatever he can for himself immediately his employer dies. Amongst a number of papers he finds one relating to the discovery of rich ore beds, but his attempts to gain possession of the document are foiled time and again, by one of the ranch-hands, Elliott, who is watching the interests of Eddie Buckle. The latter is the only remaining relative of the dead man. Snape is dismissed, but he raids the ranch and secures the paper. He so manages affairs that Elliott stands in danger of losing his life, but Edie comes to his rescue and the film ends with the downfall of the rogue.

THE MASTER CROOK (Four Parts—Jan. 15).—The master crook is a man who has been addicted to evil all his life. When he picked up his daily paper and read of the petty crimes of small pickpockets, he smiled, feeling satisfied that he would never be classed among people of that category. He goes out seeking adventure and is followed by one of the gang of pickpockets, who does not know that the man whom he is following is a master thief. By means of a hand mirror, he discovers that he is being followed; he watches developments and catches the thief. He becomes acquainted with the gang, which is composed of Billy the Dip, Barney the Fixer, and Bessie the Blind Girl. These people, who are all criminals of the smaller type, recognize in the master crook a bigger brain than theirs. They are willing to acknowledge his leadership, and to follow his advice in all their crooked deals. Satisfied that he has found reliable accomplices, the master crook plans for a great coup. He reads in the newspaper that a celebrated eye specialist has placed a magnificent pearl necklace on exhibition, and he tells the gang that he will be in possession of it in thirty-six hours. The master crook then proceeds to disguise himself, and although the police are watching the pearls closely, he succeeds in taking them away. The gang insists upon an equal share of the pearls, but the master crook is not willing to do this, as he feels that he is not sure enough of them.

The gang turns against the master crook. They kidnap him and tell him that they will keep him prisoner until he changes his mind. Finding that imprisonment does not affect his decision, they tie him by the heels to a beam in the cellar, and open the sluice gates to the river. Slowly the water comes in, and slowly but surely rises, until it reaches the top of the master crook's head. Meanwhile, Bessie the Blind Girl, whom the master crook had previously befriended, has a presentment that something is wrong. She gropes her way into the cellar, releases the prisoner, and the two of them get away. The master crook telephones the police that if they will send the reward by one of their best men to a certain West End Hotel, he will let them know where the gang is located. Detective Inspector Neville is sent. The master crook steals the notes and gets away. A week later the master crook realizes that Bessie has a possibility of having her sight restored. The man from whom the pearls were stolen is a great eye specialist and to him the master crook goes. The doctor restores Bessie's eyesight, and in gratitude for this help for the young girl, whom he is beginning to love, the master crook returns the pearls to the doctor. He then makes arrangements to earn an honest living, sends Bessie to college and dreams of a better life.

A FIGHT FOR A MILLION (Three parts).—The story opens with a scene showing Winter, an old pioneer gold digger, on his death bed revealing to his daughter, Bessie, the hiding-place of the papers which will establish her claim to the Western Star mine, worth a million dollars. Bessie's brother, Jack, back East with their mother, receives a telegram asking him to come at once to see his father before the end. Lloyd, a villainous attorney, knows that Winter has never filed his papers, claiming the Western Star mine property and immediately institutes a search for them. In a very dramatic scene he wrests the secret from the dying miner and resolves to bide his time before recovering them. In order to carry out his plan, Lloyd is forced to get rid of Bessie, and so calls in Jim Lindsay, head of a band of outlaws, who agrees to hold Bessie a prisoner until Lloyd has recovered the papers. Lindsay decides to double-cross Lloyd, and takes his gang to the bank building, intending to rob Lloyd's safe. Disappointed, he instructs his men to rob the bank while they are about it, and they make their escape and return to Lindsay's cabin. The sheriff is in love with Lindsay's sister, Sue, and hesitates between love and duty when it comes to the point of arresting Lindsay, whom he suspects of the bank robbery. Later, a terrific fight occurs between the outlaws and members of the sheriff's posse. Jack, who has come from the East in response to his sister's telegram, gets into the fracas and is made a prisoner in Lindsay's cabin. Not knowing that he is her brother, Bessie succeeds in untieing Jack and together they go to the old cabin where the mining papers are concealed. They arrive just as the outlaws take refuge in an abandoned building. In the fight that follows, Lloyd is killed, Lindsay is severely wounded and recognition takes place between the brother and sister, who have at last won their fight for a million dollars.

OVER NIAGARA FALLS (Four parts).—Tom, the son of Mr. Wright, a retired business man, leaves to complete his medical course at college. Mr. Wright accompanies his son to the depot, where he meets an old friend of his, who is sending his nephew, Bob Farrell, to the same college.

A year later, Bob loses the last cent of his allowance in a game of cards, and returning to his room he discovers where Tom leaves his money. He is caught in the act by Tom, and the next morning Bob is expelled from college and disowned by his uncle. Left to shift for himself, Bob chances to meet a man by the name of Falk, who is chief of a band of smugglers. Falk offers him a position, and Bob accepts. In the meantime Tom has received his diploma; he introduces James King, connected with the Secret Service, to his sister Nell.

One night a week later Tom receives an urgent call. Jumping into a taxi he orders the driver to make haste, and in turning a corner they strike a woman. Tom assists her home and discovers that she is the proprietress of a gambling house. While attending to the injured woman, Tom is surprised to hear the voice of his former roommate, Bob Farrell, who is still a patronizer of the card table. Farrell offers the doctor his hand, but he turns away, which aggravates Farrell. Suddenly a confusion is heard in the other room. Farrell realizes that the house is being raided, and while attempting to escape he is prevented by a policeman. In the tussle Farrell draws a gun, fires, and mortally wounds the policeman. The doctor, re-entering the room, stumbles over the body of the dead policeman, and stooping down to examine the man, picks up the gun which was dropped in the tussle. He is found in that position by the inspector, who has captured Farrell. Farrell accuses the doctor of the shooting. Next morning Tom's father reads the report that his son is held for murder and succumbs to the shock. At the trial Farrell's false testimony and the circumstantial evidence prove fatal to Tom, who is sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment.

While in prison, Tom writes a letter to his sister, requesting her to seek the services of James King in watching Farrell, whom he believes fired the fatal shot. Nell, delivering the letter, sees Falk talking to a Chinaman in the same building, and she mentions the fact to King. He is interested, as he has just received information that a clever band of smugglers has been operating on the border. He reads Tom's letter and leaves with the girl, who stops him at the corner, where she recognizes Farrell talking to the same Chinaman. King's suspicions are aroused. He orders Nell home and shadows Farrell to the back door of a saloon, where he is discovered by the bartender, who makes an outcry and springs upon him. The noise attracts the attention of Farrell, and one of his gang who hastens into the room. But the detective breaks away.

The next morning King intercepts an important telegram sent to Falk from Farrell. In the meantime Tom is dumbfounded to see one of the guards struck down by an outraged prisoner. Left alone with the fallen guard, he dons the guard's suit and makes his escape.

King tracks Falk to a railway station, where Falk steps into a waiting auto and starts off, followed by the detective in another auto, which breaks down; he starts after Falk on foot. He sees an automobile and recognizes the occupant as Tom's sister, Nell. He quickly explains the situation and jumps in and starts in pursuit. Upon arriving at a cross road they see Falk's machine stop at a building, and the detective makes his way to bushes across the way from the house; he recognizes Falk and Farrell and two smugglers placing two Chinamen into the automobile. Hastily retreating he comes back with Nell, and arrives just as the machine starts off with the Chinamen. Telling the girl to remain and watch the building, King returns to the machine and follows the smugglers, who recognize him and open fire on him. In the wild chase which ensues the machines are heading toward the railroad track, where a freight train is seen approaching. The smugglers' machine is overtaken by the train, and the Chinamen killed, but the smugglers crawl away from the ruins of the wreck to the nearby woods.

Tom suddenly comes upon the wounded smuggler, who begs him to assist him to the rear entrance of the cave. The detective, returning to where he left Nell, finds her gone. Fearing for her safety, he creeps up to the building and peers through the window, but is discovered by Falk and Farrell, who capture him and drag him to the cave. After binding the detective, Falk orders Farrell, who is under the influence of liquor, to watch the detective to see that he does not escape. One of the gang tells him that he has captured a girl hiding in the bushes watching the saloon, and Farrell upon being shown the girl, recognizes Nell and he drunkenly brags to her that he is the man who had shot the policeman and sent her brother to prison. The doctor, finding the detective, sets him free, and he tells Tom that his sister is a prisoner in the cave; he goes for help. Farrell returns and recognizes Tom. A struggle ensues, and Nell, hearing it, runs out of a chamber in the cave just as Farrell and the smuggler are binding the doctor. Nell tries to drag off Farrell, who turns on her; she scratches his face, which infuriates Farrell, and he and the smuggler drag her out of the cave, put her in a barrel and send it over the falls. doctor's cries for help are heard by the injured smuggler, who, out of gratitude, crawls on hands to him and releases him; he pursues Farrell and Nell.

In the meantime King is on his way to get help. He comes upon Falk, captures him, ties him to a tree, and then proceeds to the cave. As they enter the injured smuggler points to the opening of the cave; they leave in pursuit of the others and arrive just as the girl is put into the barrel and sent on its death dealing journey. The doctor and Farrell struggle right on the brink of a precipice, and Farrell, losing hold, goes headforemost into the falls. The detective meanwhile runs below the falls, and with the help of some workmen on the bank, pulls in the barrel and extricates the girl, unconscious but alive. The mother, son, daughter and detective are happy in the extreme at their reunion.

THE YOUNGER SISTER (Turner Films, Ltd.).—Strong parental objection toward her sweetheart, Jack Evans, causes Peggy Wright to make life unbearable for her brother's friends, Professor Dinglefritz and his son, Algy, who are visiting the Wright homestead during their vacation from college. Mr. Wright is called away suddenly on business and instructs his son to keep Peggy from seeing Jack Evans. Peggy then proceeds to get even. Disguised as a little girl, she introduces herself to the professor and Algy as Peggy's younger sister. An interesting lecture is being given by the learned professor, but Peggy is seized with a "violent" attack of sneezing and the professor is forced to abandon his work. A little later, shouts of "help" are heard and Peggy's brother, the professor and Algy rush to the edge of the lake and are terrified at seeing bubbles forming on the surface of the water. Believing that Peggy has fallen in the lake and is being drowned, they secure a long pole and are frantically trying to rescue her, when she opens a window in the summer house and asks what they are fishing for. A garden hose, with one end in the water and the other in the summer house, reveals the fact that Peggy was just blowing through the hose and that no drowning was taking place. The would-be rescuers leave the scene, thoroughly disgusted with Peggy and her pranks. Professor Dinglefritz and Algy decide to leave this place of foolishness and return home. Peggy hears of this and enters upon a plan to prevent their sudden departure. Just as the Dinglefritzes are leaving, Peggy, having put aside the little girl disguise, enters and explains that she is Peggy and that she wishes to make amends for her younger sister's behavior. Algy and his father fall completely in love with charming Peggy. In the quietude and shadows of a friendly old tree in the garden, the professor proposes and Peggy tells him that she will give him her answer the next evening at ten o'clock. Algy proposes the same evening and receives the same assurance. The next evening at ten finds Peggy, dressed as her younger sister again, awaiting the professor and Algy. She does not have to wait long, for first the professor appears followed closely by his son. Both are amazed at finding each other present, but still greater is their surprise when instead of Peggy awaiting them, they find her younger sister, who explains that she has just escaped from her room and wants them to help her meet her lover. Only too glad to do anything that will take her away from the spot where they were to receive Peggy's answer, they assist her to a small boat, in which she crosses to the other side of the lake, where her sweetheart is awaiting her. Thereupon the professor and Algy hurry back to the garden, but find no Peggy. Instead, a note which Peggy has left, explains that Peggy and the younger sister are the one and the same person.

FEATURES IDEAL.

THE MASTER ROGUE; OR A DUMB ACCUSER (Three parts).—Having gambled away almost his last penny, Edward returns home in a drunken condition. His wife has fallen asleep. Shamefacedly, he looks upon the homely picture which he forsakes nightly for his vicious haunts. A letter attracts his attention. It is from his Aunt Wilson. She writes that she will no longer supply him with money, and declines to receive him. We next see the wretch breaking into his uncle's office. He forces the safe open. Mrs. Wilson catches him in the act, but she promises silence on the understanding that he goes abroad and redeems his lost character. She then invites Jeannie and her dumb brother, Tom, to share her home during Edward's exile. Edward goes to Colorado, and one day, his partner having discovered a vein of gold in his claim, he tries to strangle him. During the struggle, he leaves a locket containing Jeannie's portrait in his victim's clenched hands. The villain succeeds in wounding all his pursuers, and escapes. Later, Mrs. Wilson entertains her staff. It is her birthday, and there is much rejoicing. The poor and unfortunate are not forgotten.

Hunted down in America, Edward seeks refuge in his own country and plans a fresh crime. He arrives on his aunt's birthday, and slips in among the guests. Jeannie recognizes her husband, and, moved with compassion, she gives him the key of the park. "Come tonight, I shall have a light in my window," she says. When all is still and quiet, he creeps into the villa. After partaking of a cold supper prepared for him by his wife, he manages to pour a narcotic into her glass. He thus gets rid of an embarrassing witness, and proceeds to take possession of the will which disinherits him. Suddenly a cry breaks the silence of the night. Tom, awakened, hastens to Mrs. Wilson's door. It resists his efforts; he lets himself down on the terrace, and, after a struggle with Edward, he gives the alarm by ringing the bell of the works, and the employees come flocking together. In the struggle with Tom, Edward leaves the weapon in his hands, and manages to escape. Mrs. Wilson, mortally wounded, staggers to her door and points to Tom. He is arrested. Next day, Edward presents himself at the villa as if he had just arrived from a journey. His wife threatens to denounce him, but he is cynically impervious—knowing that she still loves him.

The eventful day of the Assizes comes. A witness recalls the tragic scene. The unfortunate man's defense is based mainly on his affliction. He knows he is innocent of the crime, and he is sure of acquittal. Jeannie, however, questions a young advocate, and is horrified to hear his verdict: "I am afraid, madam, that, notwithstanding the extenuating circumstances, the verdict in this case will be capital punishment." She dramatically cries out: "Stop! stop! Gentlemen of the jury—that man is innocent. Mercy! Mercy!"

This causes considerable emotion in the court, and the case is adjourned until the next day. In the confusion, Edward removes his fainting wife. The terrible shock has turned her brain, and she is utterly prostrated. Edward, reassured by her helplessness, returns to the gambling den and to his vicious associates.

The servants, to whose care Jeannie is confided, discuss the latest news in the paper. Jeannie catches the drift of the conversation, and she is aroused to action. She reads the paper, and understands that the defending counsel's talent will probably be unavailing and fail to save the life of the accused. She rushes to the Attorney-General's house and is shown into his office. He is astounded at her communication, especially when he sees the locket containing Jeannie's portrait sent from the public prosecutor's office at Havre, with the report of a crime committed the year before in Colorado. Tom is brought in, and by gesture goes through the tragic scene. The spectators understand he could identify the miscreant. Just then, Edward rushes in. Tom, his eyes dilated with horror, points to him. Edward is confronted with the locket, and, seeing there is no hope, he ends his life by jumping out of the window.

UNION FEATURES.

SNARED IN THE ALPS; OR WHEATS AND TARES (Three parts).—The first part of this drama is enacted in Switzerland. Mr. and Mrs. de Larcey have just arrived to visit Suzanne Dubreuil, a young and free widow, and also Charles Vallier, a man of the world, very much charmed with Madame de Larcey.

The character of Vallier incites him to use every possible means to secure his end. As soon as Mme. de Larcey arrived Valliers resumes his suit, already begun in Paris, and bends his wits towards inculcating jealousy in the heart of Madame de Larcey. It dawns upon her that her husband is very innocently flirting with Suzanne Dubreuil, but anyway, is she not positive of the fidelity of her husband?

During a skating excursion, Jeanne de Larcey is the victim of an accident, and her friends run to get her husband, who has gone sleigh riding with Suzanne and a few friends. Thedoctor being called, declares that it will be necessary for her to remain absolutely quiet during four weeks. Everyone remains with Jeanne, but she does not wish to deprive her friends of the good hours or pleasure afforded by long promenades in the snow, racing and chasing on skates, etc., so she remains alone with Charles Vallier, who keeps her company.

Naturally, he uses this tete-a-tete to advantage, and proceeds to excite the jealousy of the young woman. He forces her to look out of a window, over-looking an interior gallery of the hotel, and there he sees Mr. de Larcey and Suzanne closely seated on a sofa and engaged in conversation.

It is enough! Jeanne still persists in doubting, but the serpent has accomplished his task. Jeanne instinctively abhors Charles Vallier and expels him, remaining crying with rage, and vowing vengeance. Her husband received a letter, calling him to Paris, on an urgent matter. Charles Vallier, not daring to present himself before the young woman, decides to return to Paris also. Jeanne de Larcey is left alone with Suzanne to meditate vengeance, and will put into execution her well-matured plan.

She brings one, who was once her friend, sleigh-riding and having arrived at a certain point, Jeanne dismisses the guide, telling him to return home, and briskly seizes Suzanne around the body, throws her on the sled and, after tying her and expressing her hate, and desire of revenge, saying: "You won my husband, do not expect mercy from me!" she precipitates the sled from the height of the mountain. Jeanne de Larcey is then maddened by the crime she has just committed, an irreparable crime, as the mountains do not pardon! But there is a God for the innocent! Suzanne did not die in the overthrow. A hunter found her inanimate on her sled, frozen and chilled with the cold! She is carried to the hotel, and then brought back to her father's at Paris, where, with vigilant care, she revives, and regains her health, little by little.

Jeanne de Larcey has returned to Paris, and her husband shows her the article in the Journal, relating the accident. Then she can no longer control her feelings, so she does not hesitate to tell her husband that she is the guilty one, and the avenger of her outraged honor. He has deceived her, and she had revenged herself! But, when her husband pleads his innocence, she realizes she has been mistaken, and already "remorse" invades her troubled soul. She wants to go and beg Suzanne's pardon, but the latter refuses to see her. Jeanne is asked to confess what prompted her to commit such a crime, and she does so only with the assurance of Suzanne's pardon, thus showing lack of friendship has not been the cause of this awful tragedy. When Charles Vallier will come to see the convalescent girl, he will find near her bed all the old friends, reunited, and before their reproaches for his conduct, he will retire, his head bowed under the heavy responsibility of his villainous act.

RAMO.

IN THE STRETCH (Four parts).—Mr. Aimsley, the owner of Dark Stranger, and Stewart Warner, a bookmaker, visit the racetrack as Phil Scovelle, a stable boy, is exercising the horse. They are enthusiastic at Dark Stranger's showing and Scovelle's riding. Warner uses his influence with the Jockey Club to make Scovelle a jockey, for which Scovelle is grateful and promises Warner to do everything he may ask. The boy is made a jockey, and wins with Dark Feather in his first race, against great odds, making horse and jockey famous.

Warner soon gets the boy to "pull" races. The jockey club, suspicious of Scovelle's riding, warns him. Thoroughly scared, he refuses Warner's demands that he "pull" the day's race and declares that he won't ride "crooked" again. Desperate with losses, Warner threatens, but in vain, and, realizing that large sums will be bet in his pool rooms on Dark Stranger, the favorite, and that he will win these sums if the favorite loses, Warner has a confederate "dope" the horse. An overdose kills the horse, and Scovelle is accused, ruled off the turf, and sent to jail. The boy serves his full term and comes out an outcast. Meanwhile, Warner has coined money in his crooked pool rooms. Jack Milton, the minister's son, becomes one of his victims. Another victim, despondent from betting losses, commits suicide.

Mary Stevens, the daughter of the district attorney, and also Jack's fiance, is saved from a runaway accident by Scovelle. The newspaper criticisms of the crooked pool rooms, and the activities of Jack's father, a leader in the reform movement, causes the district attorney to raid these pool rooms. Personally leading the raid, the district attorney finds Jack among the bettors, and tells Jack if he gambles again he cannot marry his daughter.

The net of the district attorney is drawing closer around Warner, who is as yet unknown. Warner hatches a plot to decoy the district attorney to a restaurant to meet a supposed informer. In the meantime, Scovelle has followed the men to a Chinese restaurant and overheard the plot. Hastening to the district attorney's house, he persuades him to heed the warning. The district attorney plants his men inside and outside of the restaurant and keeps the appointment. One of the gangsters get the district attorney to step outside, this being the cue to shoot; the gangsters start forward only to be overpowered and arrested by the detectives. Warner, waiting in a Chinatown restaurant, is surprised, and in his attempted escape, is fatally shot, and through his confession Scovelle is cleared and reinstated as a jockey.

Jack is being hard pressed by a gambler for a debt and is tipped off in a letter to bet on Blue Streak, second choice, being assured that Whirlwind, the favorite, won't win. Determined to cover his losses and square his debts on this sure thing, Jack takes some of his father's money. At the last moment Scovelle is picked to ride Whirlwind. Mary learns of the money stolen from Jack's father on accidently discovering the envelope which contained the money along with the gambler's letter to Jack. Mary goes to the track to prevent Jack from betting this money, but he already has it on Blue Streak. Mary borrows money from Mr. Aimsley, Whirlwind's owner, to bet on Whirlwind. Whirlwind, with Scovelle riding, wins the big race, and Jack goes broke. Mary comes to his rescue with her winnings and forgives him. Jack restores the money and confesses to his father. Jack's confession squares Moses, the old negro servant, who had been accused of the theft, and Jack's father, feeling that he had learned his lesson, forgives him. Scovelle promises to be a welcome visitor in at least two homes when he is not riding "Favorites" on some track.

THE PHANTOSCOPE

The Phantoscope is a good motion picture machine. With standard film and standard lenses, it projects a large picture taking current from the ordinary incandescent lamp socket. (Where no current is available, we supply a very efficient gas outfit.)

The Ford automobile gives satisfaction to thousands of purchasers because it is LIGHT, EFFICIENT and LOW PRICED. That is exactly why the Phantoscope is being bought in increasing daily ratio.

Ford agents make big money because they make a large number of sales and the buyer gets satisfactory service. Phantoscope agents make big money for exactly the same reason.

You know prospective customers for a portable machine. The Phantoscope is that. Why, then, don't you get your customer and the Phantoscope together? They will thank you for doing so, and you will make money, for we are liberal in our discounts.

Try us as others are. Send us a five dollar bill and we will send the Phantoscope C. O. D. privilege examination.

The Phantoscope, completely equipped, $75.00

1913's Projection on the Radium Gold Fibre Screen

¶ IN 1913 there were exactly 4½ times as many RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREENS sold as in the previous year, a fact that in itself explains the true merits and the wonderful superiority of the Screen.

¶ WE want to thank the numerous exhibitors who are using the screen for the favors that they have shown us, and assure them that we will do our utmost to merit a continuance of their patronage.

¶ THERE are today on the market a number of screens made by unscrupulous manufacturers who have given them names somewhat similar to ours in order to reap the benefit of the popularity of the high quality of the RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN. They cannot in any way compare with our screen, still they claim to have its money-saving and picture-improving features. "Imitation is the sincerest flattery." Need we say more?

¶ THERE is only one RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN, and it is manufactured at 105 N. Main St., St. Louis. It is the product of our own factory, made under the careful supervision of our own experts.

¶ EXHIBITORS everywhere are beginning to realize the wonderful merits of the RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN, and our ratio of increase for 1914 is going to be greater than last year.

¶ DESPITE this fact, although it will be a greater strain on us, we will ever strive to give the same perfect service to all exhibitors that we have given heretofore.

¶ WE again thank all exhibitors for their hearty co-operation during the past year, and we extend to you our wish that 1914 be more prosperous for you than any year heretofore.

EZO LAMP LUBRICANT

Just a touch of one of the handy-sized sticks to any movable part that does not immediately respond to the slightest touch, and it becomes a positive delight to make the adjustments. The rack bars, sliding rods, tilting screws and feed handles, lubricated with Ezo, work smoothly and evenly. The carbons feed down evenly. That means a steady, unflickering light. Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality—that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

"THE DANCES

A ONE-REEL DANCE FEATURE!

Through a stroke of unexpected luck and at terrific expense the Universal has induced the world-famous modern dancers, SEBASTIAN AND ALLEN, to pose in a series of SIX MODERN DANCES, all of which have been condensed into ONE FULL REEL. We will release this Jan. 26 under the Victor-Universal brand in order to get it to you as quickly as possible, and right while the dance craze is sweeping the whole world. This one-reel feature shows ALL THE STEPS OF THE MODERN DANCES, and shows them so plainly that anyone who can dance at all can copy them. Special music is being arranged, and special 1-sheet and 3-sheet posters are being hurried to completion. GET AN EARLY BOOKING OF THIS, NO MATTER WHAT IT COSTS YOU, AND ADVERTISE IT WITH ALL YOUR MIGHT. It is a genuine "scoop."

We Want More COMEDY DIRECTORS! COMEDY SCENARIO WRITERS! COMEDY SCENARIO EDITORS!

¶ The Universal Film Manufacturing Company is centering its mightiest effort on making the best comedies in the world. If you have a good position now, a position that HAS A GOOD FUTURE FOR YOU, we do not care to take you away from it. But whenever you want to make a change for the better and join the staff of THE BIGGEST AND STRONGEST CONCERN IN THE WORLD OF PICTURES, think of the Universal first. The instant you are free to do so, LET US HEAR FROM YOU.

¶ It ought to be plain to everyone by this time that no film concern in the universe has the vim and vigor and determination and enterprise and ambition that inspires the Universal. That is the kind of concern that you ought to be connected with, IF YOU ARE GOOD ENOUGH IN YOUR LINE. We've never failed in anything we've attempted, and we don't intend to fail in our determination to BEAT THE WHOLE WORLD WITH COMEDIES just as we now beat the whole world with dramatic productions, features and general excellence of program.

¶ We are ALWAYS on the market for the BEST MEN IN EVERY LINE OF THE BUSINESS. But most particularly just now, we want those who are high up in the COMEDY end of the trade.

¶ The opportunity of a lifetime is knocking at your door right now as you read this advertisement. NO MATTER HOW BIG OR SUCCESSFUL YOU ARE, YOU'LL BECOME BIGGER AND MORE SUCCESSFUL IF YOU ARE THE KIND The Universal IS LOOKING FOR!

Book "Absinth

It is a "Universal Special!"

Four Reels, January 22nd

"Absinthe" is an all-star affair. It is the best thing King Baggot ever enacted. It is the best thing Leah Baird ever did. These two stars supported by a great big French company were directed by a star stage-director, Herbert Brenon. "Absinthe" was made by our own company in Paris, in the very heart of the district infested by absinthe-drinkers. It has the atmosphere, the story, the plot and the straight-from-the-shoulder punch! It costs your exchange so much more than the ordinary price that you will have to pay well for it. Very well, go ahead and pay! You'll get your money back in cash, in prestige and advertising over and over again.

MORE STARS WANTED!

We already have the greatest collection of genuine pictures stars in the world. But we want MORE to carry out the vast new plans we are working on. If you are a star of the first water and wish to associate yourself with the largest film concern in the universe, the concern which advertises its stars more generously than any other in trade papers, newspapers, films and posters, let us hear from you, provided you are not satisfied where you are. DANIEL FROHMAN PRESENTS

The Noted American Artist,

CYRIL SCOTT

In An Extravaganza of Metropolitan Adventure

"THE DAY OF DAYS"

A Panorama of Emotions

By Louis Joseph Vance.

Cyril Scott, who won such sensational success in the stellar roles of "The Prince Chap," "The Lottery Man," and "Royal Mounted," is ideally cast in "The Day of Days" as a young bookkeeper named Perceval, whom fate chooses as the central character in one of the strangest plots ever written about the life of the metropolis.

Louis Joseph Vance based his exciting novel on Oriental fatalism, which assigns to each and every man his "day of days," wherein he shall range the skies and plumb the abyss of his destiny, alternately its lord and slave. The story is a kaleidoscopic drama with New York at night as a background.

EDITORIAL

THE RETURN OF THE FAVORITE

Some time ago we told you to anticipate a number of great productions starring that dainty little lady, the most popular of all film celebrities, Mary Pickford. The first of these releases is now on the way, a stirring story of tender emotions, of hearts and their longings, of trials and pitiful feminine sorrows—and some joys.

Mary Pickford will again conquer the hearts of the world. She will again breathe her sweet personality into the souls of you, and the world will be better and courage higher because of her gentle art.

Think—how a beautiful characterization can inspire an audience! How many hopes and brave, noble thoughts it can create! How much pain it can destroy! Yes, a faithful and uplifting character portrayal is a message from God.

Look forward to this Mary Pickford release. It will also be something to look back upon.

CYRIL SCOTT IN "THE DAY OF DAYS"

A Vigorous Portrayal of a Series of Thrilling Metropolitan Adventures

Following Jack Barrymore in the famous romantic comedy, "An American Citizen," the Famous Players will release, on January 20th,

One of the happiest moments of the "day of days."

Cyril Scott in the popular novel, "The Day of Days." The story takes one from the lowly earth, to the high peaks of romance. Perceval, a young bookkeeper, who has led an uneventful life, suddenly becomes the hero of a chain of fascinating and fantastic adventures, as a result of which he wins fortune and love. Rarely have more thrilling incidents been produced on the screen—perhaps you will say never. Cyril Scott renders one of the most interesting characterizations he has ever portrayed.

GOSSIP

A User of the Complete Letter Writer submits the following:

Mr. W. E. Smith, President of the Famous Players Exchange, exploiting the "Famous 30," in East Pa. and N. J., was a welcome visitor to the studios one day last week, and informs us that business was never as brisk. Mr. Smith says the Famous Players have given feature success a new meaning, and that the outlook is even brighter.

(In Three Parts)

(Copyright, 1913, by George Kleine)

"Wrecked In Mid-Air"

For Release Tuesday, January 27, 1914

Morgan and Clarke, aeroplane manufacturers, are partners. Morgan is father of a charming daughter named Betty, and leaves the business detail to Clarke, a shrewd and unscrupulous man. Wishing to get rid of Morgan, Clarke bribes two employees to swear that Morgan ordered them to send a duplicate of a machine ordered by their own government to another power. In the inquiry, affected by Morgan's grief, the employees break down and confess the truth. Clarke becomes a bandit in a mountainous section some miles away.

Some months later, Bill Sanderson, chief aviator and sweetheart of Betty, makes a flight. Looking down, he sees Betty captured by Clarke's bandits and carried away in an automobile. A stirring revolver battle follows, in which Bill and Betty are captured. They escape from Clarke's camp at night and start the aeroplane, and are several hundred feet in the air before a shot from Clarke's rifle ignites the gasoline tank, creating a terrific explosion, and hurling Bill and his sweetheart to the ground amid the debris. Placed in a disused mine for safe-keeping, Bill discovers several kegs of powder, which he explodes, blowing tons of earth and rock into the camp. With Clarke and his confederates dead, their escape to Betty's father and a subsequent minister is made easy.

Money

Money comes to the exhibitor only through the box office.

The people who bring the money to the box office are attracted by the show.

A good show day after day means good big money all the time.

Why, then, waste your effort and sink your investment in a poor show when a good show can be had for the same price?

The General Film Program has every element necessary to a good show. It has variety. It has quality. It has reputation. Its brands and its actors are already established in high popular favor. The people know it and expect it. It is as nearly perfect in every respect as the ten acknowledged leaders of the industry can made it. And it costs no more than any other program!!

Biograph, Edison, Essanay, Kalem, Kleine (Cines-Eclipse), Lubin, Melies, Pathe, Selig and Vitagraph brands on ONE PROGRAM. If you can't get the MONEY with THAT, then there's no money for any motion pictures in your neighborhood.

Trapped
TWO REELS

Kalem Released January 19th

In a desperate effort to escape, the crook leaps aboard the speeding train and hides in the watertank of the locomotive tender.

There he meets a terrible fate when the engine stops for water.

Too Late
TWO REELS

Selig Released January 19th

Guided by his artistic temperament, that yields sensitively to any beauteous influence, a composer falls in love with and marries a beautiful but shallow woman. He gives up his music for her, only to find that she has left him.

Years later, turning to music again, recognition and fame come to him and his wife returns—but too late.

Who Was Guilty
TWO REELS

Kleine-Cines Released January 20th

An enchanting detective story, so staged that you do not know until the last scene "who was guilty." A discharged employee is accused of the death of the manufacturer. A baffling mystery story, in which time and justice disentangle the knotty chain of circumstantial evidence.

The Vavasour Ball
TWO REELS

Vitagraph Released January 20th

One woman's desire for pleasure and another's love for display, bring joy to an impecunious playwright, and a happy surprise to all.

The Paleface Brave
TWO REELS

Kalem Released January 21st

Rescued by Indians, the white boy is adopted as a member of the tribe. His terrific struggle with Mexican bandits to save his childhood sweetheart is one of the breathless incidents.

The Sword of Damocles
TWO REELS

Patheplay Released January 22nd

Featuring Eleanor Woodruff and Irving Cummings. The story centers around a misunderstood genius whose great opera is taken from him by unfair means and produced as another's.

The Man from the West
TWO REELS

Lubin Released January 22nd

Personality and strength of character lead the "Man from the West" to triumph over the "social obstacles" which lie between him and the high-bred Eastern lady with whom he falls in love. A very dramatic love tale.

Through the Storm
TWO REELS

Essanay Released January 23rd

A wonderfully realistic drama of railroad and telegraph life, photographed in a raging storm.

A lineman, prompted by his duty to the company which employs him, struggles to save a fast mail train from utter destruction. He succeeds and is rewarded.

The Necklace of Rameses
TWO REELS

Edison Released January 23rd

Actually photographed among some of the world's most historic scenes, this thrilling story of a chase from America through England, France and Italy, and back to New York, is one of the most interesting films ever produced.

Hearts of Women
TWO REELS

Vitagraph Released January 24th

Two phases of feminine character, selfishness and self-sacrifice, are paramount throughout this story. A woman of whom you would expect much is saved from the error of her ways by a woman whose environment is in contrast to her nobleness.

God's Warning
TWO REELS

Patheplay Released January 24th

Featuring Gabrielle Robinne of the Comedie Francaise. An unusually strong cast. A good story and fine backgrounds of Swiss mountain winter scenery make this release particularly excellent.

THE NECKLACE OF RAMESES

IN THREE PARTS RELEASED FRIDAY, JANUARY 23rd

One of the most remarkable three reel dramas ever produced, this film shows the pursuit of a pair of criminals from New York through England, France and Italy. A necklace is stolen from a mummy in a New York Museum and the thief flees to England where she is joined by another crook. Among the many incidents which crowd rapidly upon one another, are the clever transfer of the necklace from one crook to another before the very eyes of the detective, by means of a wine glass; a hand to hand struggle in a gondola and a flight over the roofs of the houses in Rome, in which one thief loses his life.

Facts and Comments

FROM a valued correspondent in Jacksonville, Fla., we hear of clergymen altogether friendly and even devoted to the motion picture and its splendid multifarious uses. In pleasing contrast with the Nashville bishop who characterized all moving picture theaters as "dark holes of vice and shame," a prominent Baptist minister of Florida assured our correspondent, who is the manager of a big and successful theater, that he had "chosen a very fine subject for a sermon from a picture he had seen." Another clergyman, the pastor of an Episcopal church, remarked of a motion picture show he had seen that it was "a beautiful and chaste entertainment." We think the explanation is simple enough. The Nashville bishop confessedly had never been to a motion picture entertainment. He had also announced his intention of never going. He is, of course, entitled to change his mind. We feel sure that if he will go to any of the theaters in his neighborhood he will have a new and wholly pleasing experience and will, as the saying is, learn something to his advantage.

NOW that the premium fever in Atlantic City has died the natural death and the smoke of battle has cleared away what is the list of casualties? It appears that the worst offender, the man who gave away the largest assortments of meat and groceries has gone out of business. He has disappeared from the field altogether. As any sane person might have expected, the district attorney stepped in and issued an order forbidding any more "prize nights," which were plainly against the law prohibiting lotteries. Just as people pay for a newspaper because they want the news and not because they want to get premiums the public go to motion picture theaters, because they want to be amused and entertained and not because they want to get presents of vegetables or mutton chops. Giving away premiums is the surest road away from success.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has repeatedly questioned the value and wisdom of indiscriminate and unregulated admission of minors into the motion picture theaters. Some exhibitors are shortsighted in this respect. They do not stop to think of the dangers which indiscriminate admission of children at all hours of the day or night mean to their business and to the industry at large. There are hundreds, nay thousands, of pictures that may be unhesitatingly shown to adults and that cannot be shown or at least ought not to be shown to children under age. The imagination is liveliest and hungriest between the ages of about six and sixteen. It is also most impressionable during these years. Old people remember most vividly what they have seen in their childhood and their early youth. It stands to reason, therefore, that extra care ought to be exercised in showing pictures to children. Any scenes depicting depravity or cruelty, no matter how logically they may grow out of a dramatic story, ought to be barred absolutely. Stories which have their root and meaning entirely in the relation between the sexes ought never to be shown to children. One cannot lay down all the rules within a few lines, but every exhibitor feels just what is and what is not suitable for children. We know of at least one exhibitor in a large city in the Middle West who, solely through his own voluntary act and through no legal compulsion whatever, will not admit children under sixteen at the night performances. This is one way of solving the problem.

Another way would be the building up of matinees with the aid of pictures which have been specially selected for children. We do not mean by this just fairy tales, etc., but any picture which is free from such aspects as might shock and offend a child. There are lots of such pictures. They may be and indeed they ought to be strong, exciting, stirring, but they must be free from crime-painting and suggestiveness. Stories from standard fiction are almost always presentable to children. An occasional fine scenic picture, colored preferred, will fit in well with such a program. Every exhibitor has, of course, his own problems to deal with, but we may say that we know more than one exhibitor who specializes in children's entertainments and who has thereby achieved a most enviable fame, not only among the children but in the community at large. We canot, of course, emasculate the film drama for the sake of the child as books were in olden times specially trimmed and cut for the sake of the young princes of France, but we can keep all the darker sides of life away from our children, who deserve as much consideration as any prince of France.

No Distinctions in Censorship

By W. Stephen Bush.

MORE than one exhibitor remarked to the writer in the course of a talk about "censorship" that an agitation of the subject three or four years ago might have been justified, but that the improvement in the moral and artistic tone of the industry has made such agitation wholly unnecessary in these better days. We quite agree with this view and we want to add our firm conviction that this constant talk about censorship has stimulated the army of cranks into unwholesome activity. The very words of censor and censorship are odious and remind us of the times when the public hangman was wont to burn books which were disapproved by the authorities only to be afterwards enthroned in the esteem and the affections of mankind. The censor is nothing more and nothing less than an inquisitor, whose office has been held in abhorrence through all the centuries.

Why, then, should we revive either the name or the office of the "censor"? It had seemed to us lately as if the National Board of Censorship, or at least the president of that board, were going beyond the scope of their office by trying to influence legislation in favor of their decisions. Reports that found their way into the press seemed to lend color to the view that the board through its president was departing from its original policy. Mr. Collier absolutely denies that either he or the board have tried to obtain legal sanction for any of their decisions. Indeed, Mr. Collier goes even further. He dreads statutory power for his board and wishes to have it known that he would refuse such power even if it were offered to him or to the board. He says he would go on the platform if necessary in order to combat legal censorship.

If this is the position of the National Board and if it is contented to act in an advisory rather than in a coercive manner it may and probably will continue to do good. The Moving Picture World would be the first to condemn any bestowal of legal or official power upon the National Censor Board. The moment this board assumes to exercise any legalized previous restraint on the producers of films its usefulness would come to an abrupt end. Whatever prestige or unofficial power the board may hold it owes to its support by public sentiment. It will be either useful or useless just in proportion to its accordance with sound public opinion. It is not for us, but for the public at large, to decide whether the National Board is exercising its functions with a measure of success or whether it has failed in appraising public opinion. Its very tenure of office depends upon the cooperation of the great masses of our people. Its success today is no guarantee of its success for a year or even for six months from today. If at any time hereafter the Madison Avenue Board attempts to work with other weapons than moral suasion and public opinion it must be deemed to have joined the ranks of legalized or would-be legalized censors and it becomes not only useless but positively harmful.

The National Board of Censorship is after all a self-constituted body. It does not and, we think, cannot claim a monopoly of representing public opinion. Not only here in New York, but in every great city in our country there are plenty of men and women who are in all respects the equal of the men and women constituting the National Board of Censorship. We believe that in the main their decisions would be about the same as the decisions of the Madison Avenue Board. Of course, the existence of many such boards would be confusing and as long as one board is doing the advisory work fairly well there is no need for a multiplicity of boards. It is, however, entirely possible that this present board may in the course of time fail in its original objects and may, therefore, be supplanted by another board. It is also quite possible, and it is the earnest hope of The Moving Picture World, that even an advisory board may no longer be needed owing to the high moral and artistic tone among all producers. Indeed, this latter hope is a good deal more than a pious wish. We have witnessed marvelous improvements and the tendency is still upward. The path of the reputable producer is easy and pleasant while the men who want to capitalize the vile instincts and the morbid curiosity of their fellows are in constant trouble with the police and are the objects of the cordial contempt of the far greater portion of the community. They may, and on occasions do, succeed in making a few dollars in a hurry, but they place a stain on their reputations which is not only a moral reproach but a decided commercial disadvantage as well.

After all is said and done the control over the moral quality of the motion picture before it is put on the screen remains, as it always must remain, in the hands of the plain people of the land. They are the court of last resort. They have it in their power to make or mar censor boards whether these censor boards are of the voluntary and advisory sort or whether they are would-be legalized boards.

Take the case of the newspapers. They are their own censors. They hire men who sit in their offices day and night looking over the materials submitted for publication. A good deal of the stuff offered is rejected because its publication would either offend decent public sentiment or go straight counter to the law. The tactics of the yellow journals are merely an exception to the rule. The censorship of the press is entirely self-imposed. It is by no means final. It remains subject to the action of the authorities who are free to act if any publication violates the law.

The censorship of the motion picture ought, in an ideal state of affairs, be of the self-imposed variety. The editor who eliminates or rejects ought to be as busy and as powerful and as responsible in the studio as he is in the newspaper office. He ought to be as good a judge of the public taste. He ought to be as careful to avoid offense. While even in such an ideal state of things mistakes would still be bound to occur they would soon be reduced to a minimum and the cranks in search of the limelight via the motion picture route would find themselves disarmed. The talk about censorship would soon die out and even the voluntary advisory board which now exists and works with the consent of the censored would for very lack of work fall into a state of "innocuous desuetude."

In the meantime we await with interest the trial of the white slave film promoters in the Special Sessions. If, upon their conviction, the Mayor would promptly revoke the licenses of the theaters where these offensive exhibitions found a home more would be done toward purifying the atmosphere than all the censor boards could accomplish in ten years.

This would mean striking at the root of the evil. It would then be next to impossible to find a haven of refuge for this species of scandalous and offensive exhibitions. It would knock a wholesome fear into people whose conscience can be reached through their pocketbooks only.

Survival

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

PORTRAYALS of so-called "White Slave Traffic," and agitation about their exhibition, form a recent step in the evolution of the New Art. If production and display of these pictures is for the purpose of rousing public sentiment, they might accomplish good in laying facts not hitherto generally known before men and women of mature minds, especially those of authority, in audiences of a restricted character. If the publication of vice films has no better motives than those back of the production of vicious literature and vile pictures, it will either be made subject to existing laws or legislation may be expected which will indicate the difference between decent freedom and indecent privilege.

Honest censorship and manly criticism of moving pictures have been directed steadily toward progression of quality in order to win general approval among the millions of fathers and mothers who are engaged in building a great nation through self-denial, through heroic devotion to human betterment. Those millions are principally concerned with forms of education that do away with perversion, and they are inspired in their noble work by faith in our race, by hope for its improvement. If moving pictures become apostles of decadence, it is not unreasonable to expect that family support of the exhibitions will be alienated, and that legislation antagonistic to the entire industry will result.

Dark phases of life furnish interesting material for the drama. Perhaps the biggest drama of all is that going on secretly within ourselves, our constant struggle with powerful impulses and passions, our gallant attempts to attain self-control, and it is quite within the province of the dramatic art to deal with our protest against ourselves. The only thing that masters our primitive tendencies is mind. Children of unformed characters and those who have grown up physically without what is now considered to be proportionate mental development are, therefore, most likely to suffer from a lapse in quality of what excites their emotions in the pictured stories.

All intelligent men in this business realize that it can only retain and increase its popularity by keeping in accord with the spirit of the people as manifested in the character of literature most prized by the millions who purchase books and magazines. We know that the tendencies of our people are progressive. In dealing with social problems, we prefer to hear from thinkers who are really offering some solution for present difficulties, who have minds and sincere purpose, whether or not we are in accord with the views offered. One possible result of recent attempts to make money by appealing to the morbid curiosity of weaklings is that of bringing intelligent producers, exhibitors and writers, both creative and critical, into defensive accord with one another.

One of the brightest prospects may be one growing out of recent attempts to kill the goose that lays the golden egg, combination of the better elements for the elimination of the unfit. Question of motive must, of necessity, enter very largely into discrimination against what is unfit for presentation to a mixed audience, one embracing all grades of intelligence, and elimination should not apply to the product alone—it might very well include the producer. If the elimination of men engaged in poisoning immature minds should unite men of sane and sound purposes in this business, red light films may prove a blessing in disguise.

The best thing that has happened to the motion-picture industry is the incoming of men of ideals. All that art has gained, all that society, for that matter, has gained, has been won by men and women of ideals. They see beyond the bounds that limit common vision and will surely make an attempt to visualize their views. Only one in a great number possesses that breadth and scope of vision—they are the spiritual aristoi—and with the expression of their best thoughts will come a better recognition of what screen portrayals can accomplish.

Original minds will demonstrate that traditions of the older arts, handed down like instincts by our ancestors, do not apply to an art which enables one man to communicate with millions of his fellows without the limitations of language spoken or written. In spite of the fact that uttered sentiments gain from the emotion aroused by tone and its inflections, words afford but an imperfect means of communication. Words fail; they are subject to misconstruction; they too often depend for significance upon how they are received and understood.

More inadequate than moving pictures to convey the meaning we would have them bear, words increase the difficulty of transmission where only one language is spoken and make it impossible through confusion of tongues to spread one unchanged message to all parts of the earth. Original minds will demonstrate that the New Art is destined to be a factor in making us "see ourselves as others see us" and bring to the surface that inner life, the soul of humanity, so seldom disclosed, so often misunderstood. The mission of moving pictures may be to enlighten our minds through those sympathies which warm the human heart universal.

The genius who can give old thought new form, who can give our lives stimulus, variety and progress, who can place before us what is wonderful, beautiful or ennobling, who can portray conditions we may yet attain, who would enrich experience instead of vulgarizing it, who can send forth a message to satisfy our souls, may soon discover that the New Art offers him a superior medium, reaching out as it does to all parts of the earth, disposed as it is to annihilate race prejudice by cultivating a unity of spirit among intelligent people of all nations.

Those who are debasing the art, including all connected with it who lack principle and backbone, are not long on common sense, and their elimination is only a question of time. They are back numbers, out of sympathy with what live men and women are trying laboriously to impart, incapable of growth as the world advances, mean enough to destroy the charm of existence for those who are plodding along in the humbler walks of human effort. The principal excuse for our being is that we accomplish something worth while as a group or as individuals. Whether we create, criticise or publish in this New Art, let us try not to dishonor it and ourselves.

This is not an art to weary us with too much intellectuality, but to enchant us with all that reaches the soul, to teach us in touching our sensibilities. This is not an art intended for sickening and debasing public exhibition —as such it could not long survive—nor is it intended for Calibans. Rather is it intended to bring joy to dull lives, to inspire and strengthen us, to make this dull old world a much pleasanter and better place to live in. It seems destined to "accept the facts of life and build out of them a world more real than reality, of loftier and more noble import."

"The Adventures of Kathlyn."

Sets Number Two and Three of the Selig Kathlyn Series, Which Comprises Thirteen Thrilling Photodramas in All.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

THE remarkable series of photodramas under the title, "The Adventures of Kathlyn," is based on Harold MacGrath's fictional work of that name, the photodramatic adaptation being made by Gilson Willets, also a well-known author and literary man. The entire series forms a serial story in thirteen sets. The first set, already released, took up three reels; each of those remaining comprises two reels, making twenty-seven reels in all. The sets will be released so that two weeks will intervene between any one and that immediately following, thus requiring twenty-six weeks for the showing of the entire series.

These films mark not only a new departure in production and in the method of treating a prolonged subject, but they will also establish a new standard for all who follow, in the domain of perilous adventure and thrilling photodramatic narrative. One thrill succeeds another so rapidly that the spectator is out of breath, mentally, in trying to keep abreast of them; and the atmosphere of Orientalism that prevails throughout adds a feeling of mysticism that reminds one of the days long ago, when the "Arabian Nights" transported us into a new heaven and a new earth.

Director F. J. Grandon has brought himself into the limelight by the art and skill shown in the action and settings of these photodramas. His task was arduous at all times, for the scenario demands the performance of big things and nice attention to detail. Massive exteriors and interiors, impressive spectacles and weird, grim ruins bear witness to this. The hoary, mouldering Parsee temple, with its lone, prowling lion, has a haunting influence on one's mind. The harem scene is finely set. The imposing durbar scene; the great concourse of people, as they assemble to hear the final decision of the Council of Three on the fate of Allaha's unwilling queen; the fete-day scene, and the arena, where she confronts a host of hungry lions, and her rescue from the burning pyre by the ponderous elephant are some of the other striking spectacular features of sets number two and three.

Miss Kathlyn Williams and Scenes from First Picture of Series.

In all these, Miss Kathlyn Williams, as the queen of Allaha, is the great compelling figure on which every eye is centered. She is the mainspring of the action and of interest; and she is so continuously beset by dangers and seemingly insurmountable odds that one unconsciously commiserates her on her fancied woes. But some of the dangers are not at all fanciful. It takes a stout heart and a fearless spirit to stand alone before twenty lions or more, not one of which is the proverbial circus lion—"all gums and no teeth." Miss Williams is fairly bewitching through it all. I don't think I have ever seen her in pictures to finer advantage. She is always equal to the demands of the occasion, and is always ready for other exploits.

Other principals in sets two and three are Charles Clary, as Prince Umballah; William Carpenter, as Ramabai; Thomas Santschi, as Bruce (the American hunter); Miss Goldie Coldwell, as Pundita, and Hurri Tsingh (a native Hindoo), as the high priest. All are to be commended for excellent acting, costuming and make-up.

The opening scene of set number two shows the durbar, where the Council of Three decides that Kathlyn, on her refusal to become the wife of Umballah, shall be given a week's respite. During the week she rescues Ramabai from a false charge of murder made by Umballah and also frees his wife, Pundita, appointing the latter her lady-in-waiting, and Ramabai captain of her bodyguard. At the same time Bruce, an American hunter of big game, arrives in Allaha and proves a timely factor in the fortunes of Kathlyn.

Still refusing to wed Umballah, at the end of the fateful week, the Council of Three decrees that Kathlyn must undergo two ordeals with wild animals, which, if accomplished successfully, will entitle her to remain a maiden queen. The first required that Kathlyn should be human bait on a leopard's trap; the second, that she should be cast into the arena with hungry lions. She escapes in both instances by the aid of Bruce, whose aid has been secured by Pundita. In the second test Bruce blows up the great arena by a hidden mine of powder, which he had placed there. The final scene in set number two shows Bruce rescuing Kathlyn from the arena.

Number three continues the rescue, showing Kathlyn and Bruce fleeing through the forest on the backs of two elephants. Kathlyn's mount takes fright at a babboon, just as Bruce had alighted from his beast to secure water. The frightened animal easily outdistanced that ridden by Bruce and carried Kathlyn to a town in a neighboring state, where she was immediately recognized by a high official and arrested. This official condemned her to die on a funeral pyre, on the ground that she had broken the laws of her own state by refusing to wed Umballah. Just in the nick of time she is saved by the arrival of her elephant, which had heard her cries.

The elephant traveled all day, and at nightfall stopped at the ruins of a great temple. There Kathlyn dismounted and sought refuge in the ruins for the night. A huge lion, which made the temple his home, approached her, but she escaped by hiding in a great sarcophagus. In the morning she was discovered by the high priest of the temple, who worshipped her as the high priestess. Food was brought her and she was appointed to keep the sacred fire burning day and night. The closing scene in number three shows Kathlyn fleeing for her life from the lion of the temple.

Set number two will be released January 12th.

THE SCREEN CLUB GOOSE SINGS.

Just before the holidays, two brother screeners bought a fine, fat gander, intending to fatten him a bit more and to eat him on New Year's; but the bird is still alive. By developing unusual talent he has won the right to be called a brother, and has been reprieved. The discovery of his latent powers came by accident when Brother Bob Daly one evening sat down at the piano. His gandership walked up and began a performance that Brother Daly describes as uncanny. It is uncanny, for, with the proper accompaniment, the bird sings—not quacks—sings. He opens his mouth and gives forth weird notes more like a horn than like a squawker. Daly says that he wants to book the bird in discriminating shows like Hammerstein's, for instance. The gander will accommodate his brother members with selections to the extent of his repertory at any time when there is not too big a crowd. He hates to have the space around him darkened; it looks dangerous. This bird shows native genius. He has positively never appeared in public and is wholly unknown in amusement circles; but is surely destined to go down into history with the dying Swan, Philomel, the great nightingale, and Bulbul, who sang to Arabian lovers long ago.

"Pickles, Art and Sauerkraut"

Two-Reel Vitagraph Farce.

Reviewed By Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS lively and entertaining cartoon is very largely the work of versatile James Young, author and director, and Sidney Drew, though animated Louise Beaudet and shapely Ada Gifford contribute materially to the fun. There is nothing ridiculous about the physical appearance of the characters—it is not the material but the spiritual side of human nature that falls below the normal and furnishes the comic side of this picturing—hence the farce is ideographic, a cartoon. There is also an underlying idea that may not be visible to all, one relating to the incompatibility of a full stomach and the mind's creative moods. This motive, however, is barely suggested and does not interfere with the obvious purpose. What might have been a running commentary on the triumph of hunger over art, simply affords Sidney Drew abundant opportunity to amuse the crowd.

Scene from "Pickles, Art and Sauerkraut" (Vitagraph).

Drew is enabled to caricature one of those moth-eaten theatrical traditions that have come down to us like an ancestral taint, the idea that true artistic achievement is unappreciated and unrewarded because early efforts are often associated with poverty. He depicts the hungry painter in conventional form, while making it amusing by exaggeration, and finds relief for his situation by marrying a comely widow who owns a delicatessen store. He abandons art for the material gratification of waiting on customers and that supreme joy of small souls, ringing up the cash register. The revelation of an inferior side to his nature is intensified by imitation of all that is mean and low in human nature as we observe it in everyday life. His artistic aspirations become a joke.

In due course of time the jealous attentions of an overfond wife begin to pall on the artist—his hunger satisfied, he begins to long for the freedom he has lost. Bohemian by nature and training, his sex tendency to variation acquires stimulus from an accidental encounter with a former model, a lady of symmetrical proportions, delightfully obtrusive, and about this time his wife is called away by a telegram stating that her mother is seriously ill. She misses her train, as a matter of course, but, during her temporary absence, the artist establishes his former model in her place and prepares for a high old time with the best liquid and solid refreshments to be found on the store shelves. Before he can arrange to exclude all visitors, a lady leaves her baby on his hands while she finishes her shopping. On her heels comes the artist's mother-in-law and her family for an extended visit, but he proves equal to all desperate emergencies.

He paints dots on the baby's face and announces that the child has small-pox. The visitors hurry out, report to the police, and a quarantine is established. The situation grows more and more complicated when his wife returns and is refused admission, and a report of a doctor who discovers the trick does not mend matters. Throughout all that happens, and there is a riot of incident, the artist preserves a resourceful equanimity and manages to extricate himself at desperate moments. The object of the story is not a profound one—it is merely to excite one laugh after another—but it will enliven the average program and give relief to a monotony of red vengance and manslaughter. It is to amuse, and "the passion of laughter is but a sudden glory arising from conception of our own eminence."

"The Younger Sister"

Miss Florence Turner Is at Her Best in a Single-Reel Comedy That Sparkles with Humor.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THOSE old-timers among picture followers who remember Florence Turner in the early days will enjoy this picture. Very plainly the English climate has had no injurious effect on the health of this popular screen artist. Certainly in this sparkling, vivacious comedy she is as youthful as ever; she displays all the old Turneresque quirks in facial elasticity, the thousandth-second transformation from glee to gloom, and altogether is as lovable and charming as ever. Even more so; and why not? She puts into this subject all her ripe experience as well as inherent ability. She is supported by a competent cast and directed by Larry Trimble.

"The Younger Sister" is written by Miss Turner. It is a story of an English girl whose parents object to her sweetheart. The girl does not mope and weep. She determines to make things interesting for everybody in her way and incidentally for any others who may come in the way. In the latter category are Professor Dinglefritz and his son Algy, who come to visit Peggy's family. Father Wright is called away from home, but he directs Peggy to take good care of their guests. The brother also adds his warning against any tricks. Peggy, however, in shorter skirts and altogether with the manner of a skittish maiden introduces herself to the old professor and his son as Peggy's younger sister. Among the pranks is to throw into a stream under the window the end of a garden hose the nozzle of which is safely secured inside the house. By the bank is left a bit of the younger sister's personal belongings. As the two are taking life easy in the garden they are startled by cries of "Help!" Rushing to the water they find the bit of apparel. In the stream there rises a steady series of bubbles. The younger sister is in the house blowing into the nozzle for dear life as the two guests and her brother rush frantically for a boathook with which to save her dear life, more so to the brother perhaps than to the guests. As the winded trio return to the water's edge she calmly inquires from the window: "Are you going fishing?" It is such capers as these that convince the poor old professor that he is in the wrong house. As he descends the stairway determined to take himself and his son away from such an inhospitable household he is met by the older sister—the demure young woman so describes herself—and the two men need no second invitation to remain. Father and son fall in love with the older sister. Each proposes. When they come to the old tree at night at 10 o'clock to get the answer father meets son and the younger sister. Peggy takes advantage of the confusion to elope with the accepted lover.

The work of Mr. Ricketts as Professor Dinglefritz is unusually good. Mr. Ricketts is possessed of a countenance that lends itself to comedy. Complementing this factor is real talent for funmaking. Mr. Flemming is an acceptable son of the professor and Mr. Davis does well as the brother. "The Younger Sister" will delight any house on account of its story alone; it will have greatly added value by reason of the presence of Miss Turner and she at her best. January 9 is the release date.

Mr. Blinkhorn, who has the agency for Turner Films, is also showing a two-reel Hepworth, which will be released on January 19, entitled "Motherhood or Politics." It is a drama in which the suffragette question is treated from a new angle.

STOLEN FILMS—WATCH FOR THEM.

The office of the Consolidated Film & Supply Co., 914 Gravier Street, New Orleans, Louisiana, was entered by a sneak thief, December 12, and while the night clerk was in the rear room, a fibre reel case containing three film subjects consisting of three reels was stolen. The pictures taken were "Pearl's Hero" and "Baldy is a Wise Old Bird," a split reel by the Crystal Co., released December 9, 1913, and "A Dread Inheritance," a two reel Victor subject released December 8, 1913.

No doubt these subjects will sooner or later be offered for rent or sale at some theater or exchange, and any exhibitor or exchangeman should communicate with the Consolidated Film & Supply when the reels turn up. Exchange managers are requested to post this notice in a conspicuous place in their offices.

Thanhouser in New Studio

New Rochelle Company Has Abundant Facilities for Large Productions—Chat with President Hite.

By George Blaisdell.

THE Thanhouser Company will celebrate on January 13th the first anniversary of the fire which destroyed its plant. Perhaps celebrate is not just the word to use in these circumstances, but there is going to be a shindig on that date up in New Rochelle town, and the company expects a good representation from the trade. There is no question as to the attitude of the townsfolk — they, too, will be there.

Time was, in the days when Edwin Thanhouser began business in this pretty town, when things were different. Then the more conservative members of this reserved community were inclined to look askance at a motion picture concern. Now there is nothing the company desires but that the residents are only too willing to aid it in securing. When the fire that started on the thirteenth hour of the thirteenth day of the first month of 1913 had cleared away there was found one perfectly good camera minus a lens. There was a nucleus of an outfit on the Pacific Coast which contained a whole camera. A garage adjoined the ruins of the studio. Into this the company moved and immediately began the no light task of keeping up with its program of three releases a week. Practically everything in the way of equipment was constructed under the direction of W. E. Nelson, chief mechanic, and Theodore Heise, superintendent. This included all the millwrighting and the carpenter work. Mr. Nelson constructed a printer which demonstrated his mechanical skill. Mr. Heise has been in the motion picture business since its inception, and his experience was a big asset to the Thanhouser Company in those days of trial. In spite of the cleaning out of the establishment everything was in running order in ten weeks' time, and not one release was missed. The garage-studio is now used mainly for a laboratory, which is equipped with a full set of up-to-date machinery.

When Mr. Hite took up the construction of a new studio, in order that he might have abundant facilities for his big productions, he located it on the opposite side of the by-street on which sits the present laboratory. His plans have crystallized in a glass-covered studio 100 by 65 in dimensions, with property rooms and work rooms adjoining that cover an area of 120 by 40. Mr. Hite pointed out that by placing the camera in the workrooms, which are separated not by a partition but by uprights, the entire studio may be thrown into one set. Toward the main street and adjoining are the executive offices.

MR. CHARLES J. HITE
President of the Thanhouser Company.

Charles J. Hite, the man who has supervised this rehabilitation of the Thanhouser's physical property — and he admitted the other day that it had involved in conjunction with Messrs. Heise and Nelson the labor of many nights as well as days—began life on a farm in Lancaster, Ohio. Then for a period he taught school — an occupation from which many men have started a successful business career. Mr. Hite's first commercial venture was in a lyceum. Here he supplied films to the Redpath lecture bureau. Then, with S. S. Hutchinson, he opened a small film exchange in Chicago, known as the H. & H. The capital was only $1,200, but in the first year Mr. Hite cleared $5,000. This was in 1909. Harry Aitken at this time was conducting the Western Film Exchange in Milwaukee. He joined Messrs. Hite and Hutchinson in forming the American Film Manufacturing Company. Mr. Hite and Mr. Hutchinson then became interested in the Majestic Company. It will be remembered that opposition on the part of the management of the old Sales Company prevented the Majestic securing a market through that group. It was this action that suggested to the two film men the idea of acquiring a number of exchanges of their own. The idea matured, and from this beginning the present Mutual Film Corporation has grown. Mr. Hite is the president of the Thanhouser Company, vice-president and treasurer of the Mutual, and, with Crawford Livingston and Mr. Aitken is a member of the executive committee of the Mutual. He is also treasurer of the New York Motion Picture Corporation.

The writer found Mr. Hite in his office on Monday morning. He said that business from his viewpoint was most satisfactory. He had had his difficulties during the year past, but they had been surmounted. The company had not only expended many thousands of dollars in new equipment, but in spite of these outlays it had declared substantial dividends. The Thanhouser Company was now turning out 325,000 feet of film each week from its New Rochelle establishment. This does not touch the foreign market, all the printing for which is done abroad. Asked as to how he viewed conditions on the other side as regards his product, Mr. Hite said matters were in fine shape, especially in Germany and England. Mr. Hite said that he noted a reaction on exclusive films—the foreign equivalent of our states right subjects. Many buyers who had been going strong on exclusives were now returning to the standard brands, on account of the feeling among many exhibitors that there had been a deterioration in the quality of the exclusive product. The Thanhouser president expressed the belief that Englishmen are inclined to look upon pictures more as an amusement and less as a pastime, that they are more conservative than are Americans and, if possible, take pictures more seriously.

Mr. Hite said he did not think the influx of feature companies would affect the product of the established brands. He said that he was interested in a theater the business and patronage of which were closely watched from an experimental standpoint. It was his experience that picturegoing is a habit. The factor that causes a man to continue going to a picture theater may be one face or several faces he sees on the screen. Asked as to his belief in the theory expounded by one manufacturer that patrons of a theater like to see new faces, Mr. Hite said he thought it absurd. Old members of a stock company become with the public old friends, and they are looked for. He said in permanently engaging a new player it was important to note the impression created by the actor among picturegoers. "An empty head and good looks mean nothing in pictures," said Mr. Hite, "for the public is on to the combination immediately. But given brains, looks and skill, then we have a good subject for the screen."

Speaking about features, Mr. Hite said there seemed to be a desire on the part of exhibitors to give their patrons something special once or twice a week. It was on account of this well-defined want that the Thanhouser Company inaugurated the policy of a big production once a month, something the exhibitor may advertise big with paper such as he would use in billing a regular attraction. "What about the future of the single reel?" said Mr. Hite in response to a question. "Why, I don't think the single reel is going to disappear, but I think we have got to make them mighty good. They are to picturegoers what the short stories are to magazine readers. We all like to read books, but we like to read the magazines, too. So also people like to see big productions, but they like to see single reels, too. In this theater of which I was speaking we charge for our regular program 5 and 10 cents admission, and for features 10 and 15 cents. Do you know on our feature nights we do three times the business that comes to the box office on our every-day stuff?

But we know we could not run the big stuff every night – it would hurt the business.

"The public recognizes the name of an established company, and the announcement of a feature made by an old concern will fill a house. If one group of manufacturers has the advantage over another it is because it has had the time to gather experience and facilities and to accumulate that storehouse of information so necessary in the making of a perfect picture. A good production depends upon a hundred incidentals, the going wrong of any one of which may seriously mar the whole subject. We have got to maintain a good organization; we have got to work all the time; we have got to have a good studio, and to have good ideas to make this industry a permanent business. By doing we learn to do.

Interior of Thanhouser Studio.

"We are now ready to make big pictures, and we are going to make them. As a matter of fact, we have turned out five big subjects since our fire a year ago. I think there is one thing the manufacturers have to fear, and that is the amalgamation of theaters. If this ever takes place, you may be sure I am going to be one of the amalgamators." Mr. Hite admitted, however, that it would be a practical impossibility to put into effect any plan of this sort by reason of the many conflicting interests involved.

"THE BOMBARDMENT OF ALEXANDRIA" (Vitagraph).

Sailors stripped to their waists, manning the big guns; officers on the bridge shouting orders; shells exploding in mid air; mines upheaving the sea; ships in front of the besieged city returning the fire; towers and minarets bursting into flame and falling to ground in a thousand fragments; everywhere excitement and carnage, this is what takes place in one of the big scenes for a new feature motion picture drama, being produced by the Vitagraph Company, when the English battleships bombard Alexandria, the Queen City of Egypt.

The most remarkable part of this scene is that it was staged in the yard at the Vitagraph plant. The city, the sea and the ships were all stage property, and yet a degree of realism was reached which the actual bombardment of a real city could not excel.

Three large "drops" were set up at one end of a large tank filled with water. One "drop," the largest, represented the sky and the city in the distance, another was a mass of Egyptian houses and buildings, while the front "drop" showed a nearer view of the city, including the water-front with its wharves and wharf houses and many ships tied to the piers.

At the other end of the tank, facing the city, a battleship lay broadside to the city. On this ship, sailors and officers in active battle, loading and discharging cannon, while the eye of the camera records it all.

A clever electrical arrangement of explosive, including the mine of the deep tank, and the setting off of combustibles in the minarets and towers of the city, and above the water and over the ship; dazzled, and even frightened, the spectators. Some women, standing near the water's edge, jumped back and sought safety when the bursting of the guns and mines threw torrents of water about and above them. The scene was produced by directors Maurice Costello and Robert Gaillord.

M. P. OPERATOR ON BATTLESHIP.

Last week, P. T. Slamon, a blue jacket of the U. S. S. North Dakota, lying in the Brooklyn Navy Yard for the winter, paid a visit to the office of Warner's Features, Inc., in quest of portraits of Gene Gauntier, Jack Clark and Sidney Olcott, to complete his folio of motion picture stars. Besides being a sailor, he also is the motion picture operator on board the North Dakota. Every Wednesday and Saturday the Tars enjoy a moving picture exhibition consisting of one, two and three-reel subjects.

MISS JANE WOLFE.

IF MISS JANE WOLFE, the famous Kalem star, was not so successful in her photoplay work, she could easily attain rank as an architect. This was demonstrated recently when a party of prominent architects enthusiastically praised two bungalows designed and built by this remarkably versatile woman.

Miss Jane Wolfe.

About a year ago, Miss Wolfe, who is a member of the Kalem forces at Glendale, became dissatisfied with the quarters she was occupying at the time and determined to build a home of her own. Years of residence in California had caused her to grow weary of the sameness of the architectural style of the residences peculiar to that state and Miss Wolfe determined to have her home as different from the rest as possible.

For several months, the Kalem performer toiled over her plans until she finally drew up a set which proved satisfactory. To make sure that her ideas were carried out, Miss Wolfe personally superintended the construction work.

When the building was finally completed, Glendale awoke to the fact that it possessed a new object of beauty. The enthusiastic comment of the newspapers caused a party of architects from Los Angeles and San Francisco to make the trip to Glendale. In Miss Wolfe's bungalow they saw what one of their number later described as "one of the most exquisite architectural gems in California."

Despite this flattering comment, Miss Wolfe expressed herself as disappointed in the building and immediately started to work on a set of plans for another bungalow which would embody her ideas more perfectly. This building was completed recently and is considered so perfect a piece of architecture that one of the West's most prominent architects recently requested Miss Wolfe's permission to show photographs of it in an article which he is preparing for a trade paper.

As the result of the comment which has arisen, Miss Wolfe has received almost a hundred letters from people who intend to build homes for themselves and want to use the Kalem actress' plans. Some of these letters border on the pathetic and tell of the struggles experienced by the writers in saving enough money to build a tiny home.

McKAY DID NOT BUY THEATER.

It was stated in the correspondence columns in the issue of January 3, under the head of "New England and Canada," that Manager Pearson had disposed of his Broadway Theater, Somerville, Mass., to John F. McKay, an attorney and counsellor at law, in that city. In a letter to the Moving Picture World, Mr. McKay says that he has no interest whatever in the Broadway Theater, except as attorney for George H. Pierce, lessee and manager of the house. Mr. McKay further says that Mr. Pierce has had no business relations whatever with A. G. Pearson, the former lessee, who ran the house under the name of "Pearson's Annex." Mr. Pierce holds a lease from the owner, Thomas Davey, and has made a number of extensive improvements, which puts the place in the up-to-date class. Vocal and instrumental music is the accompaniment to a program of moving pictures.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE.

COLIN CAMPBELL and Tom Mix spent the last week of the old year in Chicago. Mr. Campbell is the leading director of the Selig Polyscope Co., with headquarters in Los Angeles, and Tom Mix is known everywhere that Selig western cowboy pictures are known, as the most daring rider and bulldogger of wild steers in the world.

Both visitors, accompanied by Mrs. Colin Campbell, came direct from Pawnee, Okla., and were the guests of Mr. Selig at the La Salle Hotel during their stay.

Mr. and Mrs. Campbell arrived in Pawnee, December 12, from Los Angeles, and from that date until December 22 Mr. Campbell and Mr. Mix with a host of Indians and white men were engaged in making an old-time, historical buffalo hunt production, which is at present about 10 reels in length, but will be cut down to about eight.

"Pawnee Bill's" (Major G. W. Lillie's), ranch of 6000 acres was used for the hunt. The animals were hunted and killed by Indians and white men just as they were in the days long ago on the plains, and eight bulls altogether were killed in the chase.

There will be quite a difference between the methods of the Indian and the white man in bringing down this big game, as shown in the films. The Indians will be seen stalking the herd in their own way and then killing their quarry with bows and arrows. Then the Indian methods of drying, curing and jerking the meat will be shown, affording quite an interesting lesson to the spectator.

Tom Mix.

Tom Mix is the leading man in this great western photo-drama, as the hunter and hero of the story. He is seen killing his game with musket or rifle while the animals are in wild flight, and his expert aim as a marksman will be evidenced here.

In one thrilling scene Tom Mix appears rescuing his sweetheart from a stampeded herd of buffalo, after she had fallen from her affrighted horse. The scenario of this big subject has been written by Gilson Willets, who wrote the scenario of "The Adventures of Kathlyn." In this buffalo hunt story, Mr. Willets gives us a stirring romance of the days of the early settlers in the west. How well he has done it can be guessed when it is remembered that he has written about 20 well known works, chief of which are: "The Double Cross," "The First Law," "The Workers of the Nation," "The Inside History of the Whitehouse," etc., etc.

Tom Mix, who is shown in the accompanying cut, is one of the most picturesque figures in western outside life at the present time. He is so accustomed to horse-back riding, that he feels like a sailor ashore when walking through the streets of a city. Over six feet tall, straight as an arrow, with not an ounce of superfluous flesh on his symmetrical frame and with a face that has a shade of stoical, Indian dignity, Mr. Mix is a striking figure. When walking with him through Chicago, I noticed that many eyes were turned on him; but Tom seemed oblivious of the attentions paid him. He is chuck full of nothing else, at the present time, except how to make good his part in moving pictures. He has studied the film game in his line very thoroughly since he joined the Selig forces over four years ago, and has an ambition to excel as leading man in the great outdoor picture dramas.

We shall all await with considerable interest the appearance of the big buffalo hunt pictures.

The visitors left Chicago for Pawnee on New Year's night.

Miss Gertrude Spoor Makes Her Debut in Chicago Society.

Miss Gertrude Spoor, daughter of Geo. K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Co., was brought out at a reception given by Mrs. Geo. K. Spoor, Saturday afternoon, January 3, in the Crystal room of the Blackstone Hotel, this city.

The reception lasted from three until six o'clock. Mrs. and Miss Spoor were assisted by Misses Lorna Walduck, Helen Whitbeck, Marjorie Bell, Louise Crosby, Ada Hopkins, Bessie Spoor, Hazel Candish and Ruth Wilk. A dinner followed at 7 o'clock, the guests being the young ladies who assisted in the afternoon, and their escorts. A formal ball followed the dinner, to which more than 300 guests had been invited. Miss Spoor is an only daughter and graduated recently from Miss Mason's School at Tarrytown, N. Y.

Architect of Collapsed Home Theater Cleared.

The Illinois board of examiners for architects decided by unanimous vote, on December 30, that Architect David Saul Klafter was not guilty of incompetency and neglect in designing and supervising the construction of the Home theater, which collapsed on December 9, 1912. The charges had been brought against Klafter by F. H. Davidson, representing the Chicago Architects' Business Association, asking that his license as an architect be revoked.

When informed of the finding, Klafter announced he would immediately start suit for $100,000 damages against Davidson and associates, alleging conspiracy to ruin his business.

"I have been made the goat by certain men connected with the Architects' Business Association, who were employed by Goldstein, owner of the theater, to take charge of the reconstruction of the roof," Klafter said. "In order to save Goldstein from possible prosecution by the city building department they conspired to place the blame on me and ruin my business. We will now see what a court of law will say about the case."

The state board devoted nineteen days to hearing the Klafter case. It was asserted by the representatives of the Chicago Architects' Business Association that Klafter should be blamed for the collapse of the theater roof as supervising architect.

Klafter's defense was that he did not draw the specifications for the theater roof as constructed; that R. Goldstein, owner of the building, had consulted another building engineer and had constructed the roof at a cost of $1,200 less than the estimate called for in Klafter's specifications. Klafter further alleged the owner had purchased the iron used in the construction of the roof at a low price because it was second hand.

Another point, on which the attorneys representing Klafter put much stress, was that the construction of the Home theater roof had been inspected and passed by the Chicago city building department. Klafter asserted this action by city building inspectors absolved him from blame. Building Commissioner Ericsson, after an investigation, exonerated Klafter.

Major Funkhouser, Tango Dance Arbiter.

Major M. L. C. Funkhouser, second deputy superintendent of police, this city, looked in vain for a tango teacher Saturday night, January 3. He was the chief functionary at a ball given by the Keturah Hoover tent of the Daughters of Veterans, at the Hotel La Salle.

Maj. Funkhouser, who had his badge buttoned out of sight, led the grand march with Mrs. Ella Wood Dean. After the march he remarked:

"If some one would offer to teach me the tango I would try to learn."

But no one offered to teach the dance which the major has eliminated from the dance halls.

"I am no enemy of the tango," he said, "if it is done my way."

The gallant major has added to his duties those of tango dance arbiter.

Remarkable Publicity Campaign for Pictures.

For three weeks preceding the release date (Dec. 29), of the first set of "The Adventures of Kathlyn," readers of the Tribune, American, News and Journal, this city, were puzzled by display advertisements concerning one Kathlyn. The space used at first was small, and it gradually increased until a whole page was used in the three last mentioned papers, while the Tribune had two full display pages and two pages, in connection, devoted to the first chapter of Harold MacGrath's serial story and beautiful illustrations in colors. These took up the entire magazine section of the Sunday Tribune, January 4, and over 500,000 extra copies of this section were printed to meet the requirements.

The well laid and perfectly carried out plans resulted in a great tidal wave of interest and curiosity throughout the city. This culminated in a turnout of crowds at the eleven theaters—which were advertised to be the first in the city at which Kathlyn arrived—such as had never before been seen here. The box office records were broken at most of them.

For each of the next twenty-five weeks the Sunday Tribune will run a chapter of the story with colored illustrations, and also attractive display advertisements on certain week days. The other three Chicago papers mentioned will also run displays on week days during that period.

William N. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Co., is responsible for this innovation in moving picture advertising. He has fairly astonished everybody in the business by his enterprise, and has given an impetus to the trade that is hard to measure. Exhibitors can readily compute its value, for it comes direct to them; but the whole trade generally derives a benefit that is far-reaching and up-lifting.

Following is a list of the newspapers throughout the United States and Canada which, concurrently with the Chicago Tribune, are engaged in this extraordinary publicity campaign for a period of six months:

Ashville (N. C.) Citizen, Richmond (Va.) Times-Dispatch, Mobile (Ala.) Register, Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial-Appeal, Meridian (Miss.) Star, Atlanta Constitution, Sioux City (Ia.) It Should Have Been Twenty-Six!

Julius Dalsky, of 3627 Cottage Grove Avenue, this city, failed recently to convince Judge Hopkins, in the Morals court that his work as a picture play author necessitated attentions to strange women. Dalsky was arrested a week ago for forcing his attentions on the wife of Sergeant Charles E. Dudley, of South Clark Street, who administered a severe beating before the arrest.

"I think this man is foolish," said Dalsky's attorney. "He's an artist."

"Has he an artistic license to call on another man's wife?" inquired Judge Hopkins.

"Six dollars!"

Director Edward J. Le Saint, of the Selig forces in California, and Miss Stella Razeto, leading lady of Mr. Le Saint's players, were married on Christmas day at the home of the bride's parents in San Diego. Miss Razeto was recently severely injured by a stage coach accident and had only been out of the hospital a few days when the wedding took place. This charming little actress does not intend to allow matrimony to interfere with her art, and will continue her work in moving pictures. Both bride and groom are very popular in the Los Angeles picture colony, and have been recipients of many gifts and congratulations.

The Newman Mfg. Co., of Cincinnati, O., opened a branch factory and show room at 108 W. Lake St., this city, January 1st. The office is in charge of W. J. Newman, assistant secretary of the company. Mr. Newman states that their show room has an attractive line of poster frames and brass lobby display fixtures of every description. The Newman Mfg. Co. also has a branch factory and show room at 101 4th Ave., New York City.

The Alhambra theater, 1920 S. State and 19th Streets, this city, was robbed by a gang of masked men early on January 2. The watchman was slugged and bound and the safe blown open. R. L. Jacobi, owner of the theater, reported a loss of $800.

George Kleine's "Antony and Cleopatra" opened for a run at the Savoy Theater, San Francisco, and at the Moore Theater, Seattle, Monday, January 5th. Both of these houses are of the first class. The New York opening will take place about February 15th in George Kleine's new photodrama theater, 42nd Street, near 7th Avenue. Runs of this big subject will be made at the Vendome, Nashville, January 12th; the Hartmann Theater, Columbus, O., January 12th, and in the Majestic Theater, Buffalo, January 19th.

George H. Hines, who had arranged to open the Auditorium, South Bend, January 5th, met with a serious accident on Saturday, January 3rd, which, the attending physician says, will confine him to his room for four weeks. Mr. Hines was on the top rung of a ladder adjusting his curtain screen, when he over-balanced himself and fell about 20 feet to the stage floor, tearing the ligaments of one of his ankles severely. The injury is extremely painful, but the physician did not fear a permanent hurt, was the last news received. Mrs. Hines, a clever business woman, immediately took charge of the house, and the theater was opened according to advertisement at 11 o'clock a. m., January 5th. George billed South Bend like a circus for the opening. His many warm friends in the business will sympathize sincerely with him in his mishap, and all hope that he will soon be around again to scatter his wonted "heifer dust."

Sid Olcott in Traveltalk

Well-Known Producer Tells Some Incidents of a Picture-Making Trip That Contained Real Thrills.

By George Blaisdell.

IN HIS home the other day, surrounded by many souvenirs picked up in long journeys in search of locations for motion pictures, Sid Olcott was led into talking of his experiences when he produced "From the Manger to the Cross" in the Holy Land. The former Kalem director, who is now producing Sid Olcott International Features, had told how, after ten days in Jacksonville, Fla., he had received a telegram from Mr. Marion to bring his company to New York to prepare for a trip abroad. Record time was made, and it was only a few days later when the whole party was aboard ship bound for Mediterranean ports. In Algiers the party used their first camels. Natives also were photographed. Mr. Olcott secured a few pictures in Rome, and in the Vatican photographed the Swiss Guard and the gardens. There was a hitch at Naples. Mr. Olcott had cabled from the Island of Madeira to a dragoman in Beirut, Syria, asking for his terms and instructing him to reply by letter to Naples. When the director reached the latter city the letter awaited him. The terms being satisfactory, the O'Kalemite chief wired back to Beirut: "Terms accepted. Be ready."

Sidney Olcott.

"That was innocent enough, don't you think?" asked Mr. Olcott. "But, you see, I had overlooked the fact that Italy and Tripoli, Turkish territory, were at war. From the moment I left the ship every move had been watched; when I told the officers where I had been traveling they said it was so—they knew. I satisfied them, however, we were on no warlike expedition.

"One of the pleasant incidents of our trip was the pride shown by traveling Americans in the fact that an American firm should have the enterprise to send so many persons so far from home. There were many anxious to join our party because of their belief that we would get away from beaten tracks. After a stop in Cairo we went to Luxor, 500 miles up the Nile. We were here three months. On our return to Cairo we began active work on 'From the Manger to the Cross.' There were pictures to be taken at the Pyramids and in the shadow of the old Sphinx. These were taken on Palm Sunday, by the way.

"How many were used in the portrayal of the Christ? Five in all. There was a week-old infant in the manger scene. Then an Australian family stopping at Shepheard's, in Cairo, kindly permitted us to use their baby. George Hollister, Jr., was the third. Then came Percy Dyer and R. Henderson Bland, both English. But you are getting me ahead of my story. When we arrived in Jerusalem one of the first things I did was to call on the American vice consul, Louis Heck. I want to say that the consideration and courtesy we received from the United States Consuls was very much appreciated. In company with T. A. Gelat, official interpreter, I called on the Turkish Governor General of Jerusalem. With much ceremony we were received in audience. The Governor was skeptical; he could not see things my way. After a long conversation, punctuated by many attacks of near-heart failure on my part and the exercise by us of much diplomacy, he finally admitted that the production was to be commended. Although a Mohammedan, he appreciated the interest the subject would have for the Christians of the world. He was so kind as to wish the blessing of Allah upon our work.

"I immediately got busy looking for locations. For a studio we secured a piece of ground between a monastery and a nunnery of the Roman Catholic Church. The owner was a Greek Orthodox priest. Knowing it would be impossible to secure in Jerusalem the men we required for apostles and other characters I started back to London, being certain that the remaining members of the company would do everything to further our plans. In eight days after leaving Jerusalem I was in the English metropolis. Did you know that Isidor Straus, the famous Jewish philanthropist, paid $5,000 for transportation for himself and wife between Joppa and Alexandria in order that he might make connections with the Titanic? You remember they were both drowned.

"On reaching London I went to Blackmore's. I asked the man who came to the rail of a crowded room if he could supply me with people for Jerusalem. He looked at me and his jaws spread. 'Where did you say, sir?' he asked. 'Jerusalem,' I replied.

"'Good Lord, where next?' he stammered.

"When I explained the situation and told him I wanted a man to portray the Christ he immediately suggested Bland, who happened to be there. In ten minutes the deal was closed, contingent on the approval of Mrs. Bland. Then we searched for a boy to take the part of the young Christ. Percy Dyer, the lad we selected, was over sixteen years old but looked nearer eleven. There was waiting for me a message from Mr. Marion, saying that he, with Mrs. Marion, had sailed from New York. On the steamer with them was Miss Helen Lindroth, who made a journey from Jacksonville to Jerusalem, which, I think, establishes a mileage record for a jump to join a theatrical organization, certainly for pictures, anyway. Mr. Marion said he had come over just to shake hands and wish us success.

"In forty-eight hours from the time I reached London I was leaving it with a party of eleven. One of the last things I did in the English city was to secure a work on the life of the Saviour. During the trip we took turns in reading the book aloud, so that all would become imbued with the spirit with which to approach the work. When the members of the party were engaged I explained to all what they were going to do, and that I didn't care to have them come if they could not unreservedly enter into the spirit of the task and live clean, wholesome lives. There must be no occasion for any one in Jerusalem, Mohammedan or Christian, to take exception to any act of any member of the company. It is a pleasure to say there was not one complaint during all our stay in Jerusalem—that is, against any individual of the company.

"There was, however, trouble a day or two before we finished the work. I'll tell you of that later. We took pictures in Bethlehem, Bethany and in the Valley of Jehosophat, as well as in Jerusalem. We traveled by wagon and horseback to the Sea of Galilee, 224 miles, through a bad country. The East still has its robbers. We dared not travel at night. In the City of Tiberias Mr. Bland took the first scene in the life of Christ. Here we gathered some shepherds right from their flocks. We stopped at Nazareth for the scene of Mary at the well. It is supposed to be the same well, with slight improvements.

"On Fridays, the Mohammedan Sunday, it was customary for the members of the cabinet of the Governor General to visit us. One day I persuaded them all to be photographed in a group with the apostles, the latter arrayed in the ancient garb. It was very fortunate for us, as events proved. In the crucifixion scene we were to employ many natives who lived in the Mohammedan quarter. Now, it is not necessary to point out that the graft we hear of here at home is not a recent invention or a trait of any particular nationality. These natives of whom I speak were on a par with the gunmen of New York. Apparently, they arrived at the conclusion that there was something being overlooked. On the day before the crucifixion was to be made we were taking scenes on the Mount of Olives, near the Garden of Gethsemane. I was very much surprised to find that orders had been sent by the Governor General to the officers stationed with us that they were to withdraw immediately."

It was at this point we got so interested we forgot to make notes, and what follows will be from memory of a conversation several days since. It seems Mr. Olcott and George Hollister started out to discover what had happened. A dozen or fifteen Mohammedans armed with clubs attacked the two. They backed up against a coffee-house. When matters began to get serious Mr. Olcott drew an automatic revolver, and after much use of the sign language amplified with suggestive gestures with the weapon, the thugs departed. George Hollister was having a hard time with the camera. The director got the Vice Consul and the interpreter to accompany him to the office of the Governor, after he had been assured by smiling and smirking officials that not a thing could be done to help him and that his privilege had been withdrawn because it was felt that what he was doing was degrading the Mohammedan belief. The Governor was adamant. He said that Constantinople would not like it, and that he himself had not understood the circumstances anyway. Mr. Olcott's turn came right here. He recalled to the Governor the photograph of the cabinet and the apostles. The Governor evidently realized that in face of that picture he could not plead ignorance and told Mr. Olcott he might proceed and that his protection would be restored. When the director went back to where he had left his company he found all had gone to their hotel, where the members afterward said they had received word to return and supposed he had issued the order.

As Mr. Olcott was walking back a native stepped beside him and inquired if he wanted to make a picture on the morrow. The stranger told him not to turn his head. When the director replied that he did, he was asked what he would pay. "Come to my hotel," said Olcott. The native followed him. When the two were behind closed doors the native demanded 200 pounds Turkish for the privilege, to be paid into his hand then. He finally agreed to accept 100 pounds. Mr. Olcott told him to come back at 8 o'clock that evening. Then the American gathered his two friends and went after the Governor. His "Irish" was up. He threw diplomacy to the winds, and against the protest of the Vice-Consul insisted the interpreter say for him to the Governor that the official had been made a fool of. Mr. Olcott was emphatic and belligerent. The governor became interested in the story of the demand for money. He said there would be extra protection assigned to the American company the next day and was positive that all would be well.

When Mr. Olcott returned to his hotel the dragoman, Ameen Zaytoun, was missing. It was 3 o'clock in the morning when he came in. All night he had been about the coffee houses, taking his life in his hands. "He has the heart of a lion," said Mr. Olcott. "He told me that the gangsters were going to mix in the scenes the next forenoon and that they intended to hurt us. 'Badly?' I asked him. 'Yes, worse than that.' But Ameen said if I took the picture he was to go, too. No, the stranger never came for his money. There was but one thing to be done and we did it. We started for the location at daylight and traveled by a different route than that intended, and returned that afternoon in safety. Eventually we engaged a special train, and we left Jerusalem at an hour earlier than any other train had been known to leave the Holy City. So that is why we did not show a triumphal entry into Jerusalem. It probably would have meant bloodshed.

"When I look back and think of the assistance given by Bob Vignola, Jack Clark, Jack McGowan, Allen Farnham and George Hollister, not forgetting our English friends—and the women bore their share, too, Gene Gauntier and Alice Hollister—I want to thank them for their co-operation and for the way in which then entered into the work."

Those who have been so fortunate as to see the remarkable "From the Manger to the Cross" know with what reverence and technical skill this little band of American and English players treated a most delicate subject.

HIS NOTION OF WORK!

Dave Thompson.

Dave Thompson, the veteran Thanhouser player, is nothing if not a busy man. Recently he was appointed studio manager of the Thanhouser plant—by the way, he was Thanhouser's first studio manager, to go back into ancient history—but he said he wanted to go on acting. Mr. Hite, though, knew Thompson had fitted himself for the post by previous experience. You see, after being the pioneer studio boss at New Rochelle, Thompson quit the job to take his family to Europe. Returning to the Thanhouser employ, he became a leading man. But President Hite, knowing the Thompson worth, arranged that he take over the managing work and play in the pictures besides. So now Dave gets all the stages in order mornings for all the Thanhouser directors, places the right "people" with the right producer, "makes up" and jumps into a "lead" himself, finishes, "washes up," orders the various stages and sets dismantled, orders used costumes returned and new ones produced, writes up the new property lists, tells the scenic artists the new "drops" he wants painted and "calls" the people for the next day! Upon the finish of which Mr. Thompson has "nothing to do till to-morrow"—provided some delayed director isn't using the studio at night!

Herbert Prior

An Early Recruit from the Legitimate Now Firmly Established as a Leading Photoplayer.

HERBERT PRIOR, now one of the best known figures on the photoplay screen, is a native of England. Before becoming a photoplayer he spent fifteen years on the stage, having entered the profession very young. A man of high ideals and serious purpose, Mr. Prior worked hard and studied constantly, always with an eye to self-improvement. He forged steadily ahead and had gained considerable prominence when the motion picture suddenly loomed upon the horizon.

Herbert Prior.

Being an independent thinker, Mr. Prior refused to accept the attitude of aloofness affected by the theatrical world toward the motion picture. He was, in fact, one of the first successful actors to go over to the new field, realizing that it offered a tremendous opportunity. Like many actors who have followed his example, Mr. Prior was strongly influenced in his choice by the tremendous range of characters which the actor portrays in the photoplay and by the unparalleled opportunity for developing versatility which the screen affords. Then, too, the idea of reaching so vast an audience appealed to him as he realized that he would be appearing all over the civilized world.

So, despite the protests of his friends, Mr. Prior became a photoplayer and he has never regretted the step. As he himself says, "I consider the time which I have spent with the Edison Company to have been the most desirable and most instructive years of my life, as I spent two winters in Cuba, covered the Canadian Pacific Railroad route through to the Rocky Mountains, visited Colorado, Maine and made numerous short trips. I saw more and learned more of the beauty of nature during these trips than I did in all the other years of my life." Mr. Prior is at present in Florida with the Edison players where he will remain during the winter, playing leading roles in several important dramas which have already been planned.

Mr. Prior has, of course, played in innumerable Edison films, ranging from the broadest comedy to the most thrilling drama. Among them are to be mentioned "The Doctor," "The Battle of Trafalgar," "His First Valentine," "Why Girls Leave Home," "Janet of the Dunes," "Saved by the Enemy," "The Pied Piper of Hamelin" and "A Night at the Inn."

Mr. Prior is also the author of several well known Edison comedies, a few of which are: "A Pious Undertaking," "Bill's Career as Butler," "The Desperate Condition of Mr. Boggs" and "Othello in Jonesville."

Although a past master in the art of fun making, and although he has confined his scenario writing to comic subjects, Mr. Prior is by no means to be considered a comedian. His interpretation of dramatic roles is powerful, sympathetic, real. It is in fact a high expression of the art of acting.

A strong believer in the power of personality, and endowed with those characteristics which win and hold friends, Mr. Prior, by virtue of his natural gifts and the unceasing labor with which he has molded them into their present high form, stands to-day among the foremost players in the film world.

SEIGLER BUYS THEATER LEASE.

Albert J. Seigler, of Pleasantville, N. J., has recently purchased the five-year lease on the People's Theater, that city, and is giving the inhabitants of Pleasantville a good show of moving pictures and vaudeville for admission prices of ten and twenty cents. Mr. Seigler has also acquired the control of the picture house which was owned by F. A. Hubin, who opened the first photoplay house in that city. The latter house will be devoted exclusively to the exhibition of motion pictures, with admission prices the same as the People's Theater.

Moving Picture Educator

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

ALTHOUGH there is at present one of those periodic "lulls" in the general exhibition of moving pictures in which they seem to be only "marking time," there is a noticeable development of educational Kinematography in all parts of the world. The practical value of the moving picture is daily being tested and approved.

In London recently an exhibition, held especially for the purpose of securing the attendance of the highest authorities both governmental and educational, was a success. The promoters declared that the object of this demonstration was "To show the opportunities which exist for using the moving picture in extending a knowledge of the world and its peoples among school children, for brightening their intelligence, and improving their powers of observation." The outcome marked a distinct advance in the English capital for the broadest class of educational moving picture exhibitions.

Another special exhibition was given in a university town to test the nature of the response from a student community. The result was both disappointing to the organizers and discreditable to the student body. It appears that the students, with the traditional schoolboy aversion to study, claimed the moving picture exhibition as only and necessarily amusing, and found little pleasure in attending anything educational outside of the classroom. The promoters of this experiment give as their experience, the fact that students welcome the moving picture to teach them in study hours, but want it to amuse them at other times.

They also found that the so-called "middle class" were those who gave the most cordial welcome to the educational program. This accords with the general experience in America, that the great solid middle class of society, intelligently and numerically the strongest body of people, are those who give most cordial welcome to the intelligent program. It should be noticed that in all these above named instances the subjects shown were always of a varied character to avoid sameness and monotony and also always relieved with a touch of the humorous.

The French bulletin of the Chamber of Commerce officially announces the popularity of the moving picture in the Orient, Turkey and Egypt now exceeding Greece in the strength of business done. At the present time, says the report, "French films are by far the most popular, although American films are not despised."

The one firm of film manufacturers in Greece has so far only produced topical and scenic pictures, but intends soon to produce spectacular ones using the "natural beauties and historical monuments which abound in the land."

A Special Church Program.

From Pasadena, California, comes the report of a successful church use of moving pictures upon a well organized plan which, because of its evidently commendable character, we publish in the language of our correspondent who was present:

"I attended the services last evening and was delighted; the first film shown was a Pathe scenic; then the choir sang a number from 'Tannhauser,' followed by a few remarks from the minister who pointed out that the appeal to the eye is just as legitimate as the appeal to the ear, and who went on to indicate the lesson taught by the story of Tannhauser, 'The way of the transgressor is hard,' and the prodigal son parable; then the 'Tannhauser' films were shown, and several numbers—notably the 'Pilgrims Chorus'—played on the organ. The doxology and benediction closed the service, which as far as I could judge from the number of the congregation around me as we passed out of the church, was impressive and helpful: nothing of the message was lost in the telling. Next Sunday evening, the service is to be on human degeneration and regeneration, with 'Silas Marner' as the feature film. There is to be a regular Friday evening service, or program, in which educational ideals will be the central note, especially for the children.

"Tickets were sold at the door, ten cents, and no collection of any kind taken up. The charge for admission is to be continued until the machine is paid for, I believe. It is a wise measure anyhow because free and 'silver collection' events are always packed to the doors."

This example may worthily be followed by many others. It is one of the best methods of dealing with the controversial spirit shown in many places and clears the way to secure a proper adjustment of the moving picture in religious uses.

In America while the large cities are being agitated by the question of the moral and social film the educational picture is steadily gaining in its manifold application. The government is using it with lecture courses in all its departments now, while among the churches its growth is very largely increasing. Agreeably with advice given on this page, a clergyman who could not secure the exhibition in his church, arranged a program with a nearby exhibitor and began a series of helpful evenings with subjects according to his ideas in the moving picture house.

In scholastic circles we understand that the Gunnery School, Washington, Conn., has recently installed an Edison Model B machine and asbestos booth, this outfit having been supplied by the Picture Theater Equipment Co., of New York City. With the continuance of these reports from churches and schools, there is a steady and constant indication of the progress of the work in which we are so vitally engaged.

A prominent Massachusetts clergyman, writing, asking for information on religious and educational pictures says: "I am preparing a paper on the motion picture theater, which may have some influence on a pending public issue. My own feelings are favorable to the moving picture side, but I wish to be accurate in my statements, I am especially desirous of learning to what extent the educational films have been developed, and the possibility of the motion picture along educational, ethical, and religious lines." Questions like this are indicative of the state of Kinematography in the educational world at large.

SUNDAY SERVICES IN PICTURE THEATER.

The Grand Motion Picture Theater, of Redlands, Cal., is being put to a new use on Sunday evenings, when it is engaged by the Men's Bible Class of the First Presbyterian Church for evangelistic services. The meetings are held every few weeks and are undenominational, their object being to get hold of non-churchgoers. A good speaker is secured and words of hymns with well-known tunes are thrown on the screen so that all may join in the singing. Two reels of film are shown—one a religious, and the other an educational. The meetings so far held have been highly successful and it looks as if the class may be in the way of solving the important problem of how to reach the persistent non-churchgoers.

EQUIPMENTS IN Y.M.C.A. AND Y.W.C.A. HALLS.

To add to their efficiency along educational and social lines, the large Twenty-third Street branch of the Young Men's Christian Association, in New York City, and the Young Women's Christian Association, of Newark, New Jersey, have both installed complete moving picture equipments, including screens, booths and Power's machines. The installations were taken care of by the Picture Theater Equipment Company, of New York City. It is pleasing to those who have the best interests of the industry at heart to see the possibilities of the pictures becoming more and more recognized by the people at the head of institutions such as the above.

AN INDUSTRIAL DRAMA.

The pottery industry has been chosen to lend educational value to an already fascinating drama by the American Film Mfg. Co. The actors are engaged in various occupations and perform their work with such apparent interest that it is with difficulty they are distinguished from the regular force. The picture will be named "At the Potter's Wheel."

"On the Lazy Line."

An Edison Comedy Hit.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

WHY is it bound to make a hit with all classes of people in the motion picture audience? Because the author, Epes Winthrop Sargent, disdained all conventions in contriving a story that makes us laugh without knowing why? Because Director C. Jay Williams was in his happiest mood? Because William Wadsworth and Arthur Housman are veritable "screams" in their roles? Because of their admirable support and settings that are beyond improvement? Probably because of all these in exceptional combination.

I will try to explain why I laughed, but Bannon, who helped constitute an audience of two at the private showing, remarked that the photoplay was "naturally funny." That defines it truly, if vaguely. I may be permitted to explain, en passant, that Bannon, the new Edison publicity manager, has not been long enough at it to become an accomplished liar. I also laughed, though the average screen comedy seems about as gay to me as a boil on the neck, or a performer who is dying to tell me all about his "act."

Scene from "On the Lazy Line" (Edison).

The mortgage on mother's home must be paid by 6 o'clock to-night. Her son, Herbert Pryor, and his wife, Mrs. C. Jay Williams, hasten to the rescue. They hasten by ordinary train to a country station, where they must transfer to the "Lazy Line." They find a two-car train, that is a joke in itself, hitched to one of those old-fashioned wood engines with a funnel smokestack, and the engineer and conductor deep in a game of cards on the cow-catcher. "What's your hurry?" Conductor Wadsworth asks with an aggrieved air—he has been losing money—"It's only forty minutes after our regular starting time."

Scene from "On the Lazy Line" (Edison).

This opening phrase—one of the sure signs of a well-constructed screen story—sounds the entire theme. The train stops for fuel, and the conductor hands the engineer chips until the anxious passenger who is hurrying to pay the mortgage on mother's house does all the "wooding up" on his own account. There is another stop to deliver an express package, a graceful act of the conductor enlivened with refreshments at the point of delivery. The engineer is snoring on the track in front of the cow-catcher, and the conductor, on his return, begs, "Poor fellow! He is tired out. Let him sleep!" The train gets under way once more, but, while it is running at top speed, the engineer chats from his cab with Alice Washburn, while she strolls along by the track. The inanimate object, the train itself, seems imbued with comedy—the engine sends forth great clouds of smoke and steam during the entire performance, and the situation grows more and more ludicrous, until anxious Pryor and his wife get out and walk. The smoking train is seen in the far distance when they reach their station.

There are many humorous situations on the trip, but the idea behind them is what starts one laughing. The clumsiness, laziness and awkwardness of engineer and conductor, the latter's inane attitude at each stop, what is manifestly far below the level of action on modern railroad lines, the deviation from what we have become accustomed as normal, all these become ludicrous in their solemnity. From our point of view of tremendous energy and activity, a superior point of view, this glimpse of innocent incapacity excites our sense of the ridiculous very much, as does vain pretence among our fellow creatures in the moving picture business. The comedy is "naturally funny," and it is bound to please all who see it.

"For the Queen's Honor."

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS feature, a three-part Ambrosio, deals with a very strong story, which might possibly have been rendered more strongly. Here and there were evident traces of haste. The characterization was not always up to Ambrosio standards. With these reservations, the feature is deserving of great praise. The settings are superb; the movements of the large bodies of soldiers are rendered with remarkable distinctness, and the plot is full of power.

The action takes place in one of those mythical modern kingdoms which Anthony Hope has made so popular with writers of fiction. A young officer is in love with the queen of the realm. The queen ardently reciprocates his affection. They are in danger of forgetting their duties when the lover discovers a conspiracy against the king set on foot by the officers of the army. His soldierly sense of loyalty asserts itself, and, forgetting all else, he runs to the palace to warn the king. The latter, a worthless sort of monarch takes flight and saves himself, taking his wife, the queen, with him. In due course of time the king's faction in the mythical monarchy regains its power and the king is called back to the throne of his fathers.

Scene from "For the Queen's Honor" (Ambrosio).

The night before the formal ascension of the throne the queen and her lover are bidding each other farewell in one of the secret chambers of the queen's suite. So engrossed are they with their sorrow and their unhappy love that they do not notice the fire which has broken out until the very flames are upon them. The situation is one of extreme distress and peril. If the young officer is found in the company of the queen it means dishonor to the queen. Rather than imperil the good name of his queen the officer plunges into the flames, while the queen is rescued in the nick of time by the firemen. The noble self-sacrifice of the young officer is brought out with the most tragic effect. It is needless to add in an Ambrosio that the photography was perfection itself.

A Feature that Charms.

Great Northern Four Part Subject "The White Ghost," a Picture Rich in Delightful Comedy.

A YOUNG MAN who is in love with the daughter of the surveyor of his father's estate, the comfort-loving father, his termagant sister who domineers the poor man's existence and purposes to attend to the love affairs of her nephew according to her own plans, the lady of her choice, and a few minor but necessary characters, is the Great Northern's recipe for one of the most delightful, romantic comedies it has been our lot to observe on the screen in many a day.

Count Bille was a good fellow in a ponderous way and enjoyed the good things of life. He would have permitted his son Eric to marry the surveyor's daughter without question, but the Count had as sister, Ulrica, who had picked Lady Vera Trop for her nephew, and made life miserable for her brother because he did not enforce her arrangements upon his son. While matters are in this unsettled state Lady Vera calls, and the Count and his sister contrive to leave the two young people alone. Eric snatches this opportunity to tell Lady Vera that he is in love with the surveyor's daughter, and to ask her to help him secure his father's consent.

Scene from "The White Ghost" (Great Northern).

Lady Vera is one of the proud, spirited kind and does not relish this bit of confidence, but she realizes that Eric, with his heart somewhere else is not the husband she wants, so she promises to help him out of his difficulties. Womanlike, she takes an opportunity to look over the surveyor's daughter, however, before she finally consents to the plan and probably concludes that if the man at stake has a mind to rise no higher than this simple maid it would be a waste of her talents to bestow them upon him.

But how to bring about the desired parental consent. A house party is given by the Count, and during the festivities the Count is prevailed upon to tell the legend of the "White Lady" whose portrait hangs in the ancestral hall. The story is to the effect that the lady, daughter of an ancient owner of the castle, had fallen in love with a poor keeper's son; the discovery of her love and the rage of her father caused her death, and it was related that at times her figure in the canvas was seen to step out of its frame and walk abroad at night. As Count Bille relates the story to the company his tale is visualized for the benefit of present audiences — a clever bit of double exposure.

To Lady Vera the legend suggests a way to solve the difficulties of Eric, and, with the assistance of several young men of the party, she proceeds to put her plan into execution. It is the duty of the young men to entertain the Count for some time after the rest of the guests have departed, with the result that he has to be put to bed. Lady Vera has, in the meantime, secured the bridal robe of the "White Lady" which had reposed in a trunk in the tower room all these years. Attired in this she takes her place in front of the portrait and is flanked by two of the young men dressed in ancient armor. The Count, now dead to the world in slumber, is carried from his chamber and placed in front of the portrait. At the appointed hour the "White Lady" steps down from her frame and arouses the Count and compels him to give his written consent to the marriage of his son to the surveyor's daughter, whereupon he is taken back to his chamber to complete his slumbers undisturbed. Next day matters are arranged to the satisfaction of Eric and his sweetheart, much to the discomfiture of Aunt Ulrica.

The part of Lady Vera is played with infinite charm by Miss Rita Sacchetto. In her we see the resourceful, hoydenish young woman of our own times, ready for any prank that will furnish wholesome amusement for her friends. She plainly puts her whole heart in her play and her portrayal becomes a living thing, pulsating with the real red blood of youth.

The scenes and setting throughout are above criticism and the excellent photography of the Great Northern puts the finishing touches upon a work of kinematographic art.

"The House of Bondage."

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THE open sewer has arrived. When Judge Gavegan, of the Supreme Court, declined to restrain the police from suppressing the vulgar and disgusting "white-slave" films he said that it "might be possible to find individuals of such morbid curiosity that they would be willing to pay an admission price to see the inside workings of a sewer and others of such avaricious enterprise that they would be ready to capitalize such morbid curiosity and furnish the exhibition for a price." Justice Gavegan was a prophet, for the open sewer has arrived and men have been found willing to capitalize the curiosity of the degenerate.

It is impossible to describe the contents of this "feature" without soiling the pages of a reputable journal. After seeing six reels of the vile and revolting stuff, I was glad to get out into the fresh air and any persistent attempt to recollect all the filthy details of the production might act as an emetic. How any human being can have the base effrontery to offer such a digest of dirt for public exhibition is utterly beyond my comprehension. Perhaps the public exhibition will never take place. Not that I expect any eleventh hour repentance on moral grounds, but it seems very clear indeed that the law forbidding obscene and indecent exhibitions will come to the rescue of the public and of our women and children especially.

The courts in this and in other states have held that the showing of scenes supposed to occur, or to have occurred, in houses of prostitution constitutes an obscene and indecent exhibition, tending to corrupt the morals of the young. As by far the larger part of this wretchedly cheap concoction is devoted to portraying conditions in houses of ill fame it is reasonable to expect that the police will arrest and the public prosecutor will prosecute any individuals connected with a public exhibition of this infernal picturing of filth.

The pictures were shown in the presence of the people responsible for them. To aid the reader to make an assay of the mental and moral calibre of the promoters of this infamy, I think it is well to set down an incident that occurred during the running of the "feature." Toward the very end a scene is shown in which the country girl that had been ruined by the male procurer meets that loathsome individual on the street. The girl is now beyond redemption and has become part of the very dregs of human society. As she recognizes the procurer she asks him for a drink and the pair go to a dive where they are served with liquor. The procurer is soon under the influence of the cheap alcohol and the girl turns to him and addresses him, when this title is flashed upon the screen: "Come on, Max; come to my room — you can sleep it off there."

At the appearance of the title, one of the men interested in the horrible abortion put this strange query:

"Say, maybe this title is a bit too raw."

There came a swift reply from another interested party something like this:

"Naw, that's all right."

Thus was the day saved for morality.

If this sickening monstrosity is permitted to be publicly shown or if any deliberate and persistent attempt is made to show it publicly it will do more harm to the motion picture art than it is possible to calculate. We have put it in the pillory to have its vile character known to all men and women friends of the motion picture. Let it be anathema. Whoever has charge of the screen where this mass of corruption was shown will do well to disinfect and fumigate the projecting room and I think that even the machine ought to be washed, together with the reels and the magazines. For the men whose "avaricious enterprise" has made them lose sight of the commands of ordinary public decency we have as much contempt unmixed with pity. They really have brought reproach upon the human species.

FRANKLIN, PA., GETS NEW HOUSE.

Grant Bolmer, of Franklin, Pa., will open about February 1st, a new picture house to be known as the Park. Mr. Bolmer is a pioneer picture man. The theater will have a seating capacity of 700, and its programs will be composed of Mutual releases.

"Frou Frou"

Miss Maude Fealy Makes a Charming Frou Frou in a Very Pretty Thanhouser Four-Part Offering.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

A MOST charming picturization of Lloyd F. Lonergan's dramatic story has been made by the Thanhouser Company using Augustus Daly's theater version as a basis for the scenario. To say that it is wholly successful would not be quite true; for the third reel, filled as it undeniably is with the character of the unusually attractive heroine, is not dramatic. It attempts to carry the story forward and does so in a way; but lacks the convincing truth and the inexorable logic of the two parts that precedea.

The forth reel again gets hold of the story and makes it real to us; but even at the best this part would have been mere denouement which, in a drama, is just the accounting for the different threads of suspense. There is still a good measure of suspense left; but the big interest, the fate of Frou Frou's petty pretty heaven of selfishness, is settled. The summer time of her pretty butterfly life is over and done and what is to happen to her delicate wings is of less importance. Yet, Mr. Exhibitor, here is a delightful picture. It deals with no petty or insignificant fates; it has been made by charming artists and is full of things that will appeal strongly, just as it is. It is an offering to quicken the imagination. That is all the best dramas are intended to do.

Scene from "Frou Frou" (Thanhouser).

Miss Maude Fealy, who takes the leading role, makes a lovely Frou Frou. The character of this morally unsubstantial hot-house flower bit of humanity has been drawn with great skill. Our getting thoroughly acquainted with her, as she is portrayed by Miss Fealy, is decidedly pleasant. Every step she takes, every gesture, is as feminine as Eve; yet there is a fairy like touch of unhumanity, which is not inhumanity, about her and, if she doesn't take up the duties and obligations of human life, well, she's charming and that means a great deal. At the end of the second reel we find her in a situation in which her absolutely emptiness has been filled with a sense that the ground is slipping away from under her feet. She has been of no help to her husband, she has refused to be a mother to her child, she has understood her self-sacrificing sister just well enough to impose on her. And now she has been wakened to a realization that her sister is of use in the household and that she is a nonentity. Her boy loves his aunt more than his mother. She makes a weak attempt to regain her position and fails. Her husband won't take her seriously. All this is shown in the third reel and much space is given to showing it with very little effectiveness. Economy of attention would be gained by cutting away all those opening dance scenes. They add very little to the story and it has all been shown in the second reel. We already realize that she is not without temptation; but there has been little danger from it up to now. You could tempt a rose with as much hope of success. Now the empty sheath of the woman has been filled with the knife of discontent. She is likely to cut through her troubles and fly to some other kind of summer weather merely because this that she owns is becoming chilled. Her husband fails to realize this and the weakness of the third reel is most in that this important fact isn't pictured clearly. The sister saw it a bit sooner than he and if she had tried to make the man see it, it would have given more dramatic struggle and more even progress through the reel.

The sister's unaccountable futility when Frou Frou has determined to run away with the dissolute count is weak; for it is distinctly out of line with these two characters. The sister seemed to make no real struggle at all. The weakness is in the business not in the acting. This role of Louise is taken by Phyllis Bostwick whose work is strong support to the picture. Harry Benham, who plays Frou Frou's husband, also does commendable work. James Cruze, his false friend, plays with the passion necessary. Her flight to him when the chill winds began to blow was quite understandable. Both these men are thoroughly at home in their business in those scenes in the last reel immediately following the discovery of Frou Frou by her outraged husband who has followed her flight to Venise and they are seen also in the duel.

The picture has wisely made much of its nursery scenes; they are of the greatest importance in this particular story. The little son of Frou Frou is played by "the Kidlet" and surely the youngster has a charm that is remarkable. These scenes are as full of poetry—the nursery itself and all the action around the boy are tremendously effective for good on the picture's impression. The photography and the staging of the whole offering are meritorious. There are slight short-comings. Mr. Cruze wore the same suit of clothes through, it seems, the whole story, even in the duel he had the same cut-away suit that he wore at the rehearsal of the play for the poor, held two years before at the home of Frou Frou. Then that out-door scene in Venice was quite plainly an American wooden piazza. Yet, although there are certain things that it was necessary to criticise, it remains true that most of the picture is wholly successful and that its beauties and good qualities over-balance its defects. It is truthfully a most charming offering and this reviewer counts himself lucky in having had the chance to see it. It is above the average as entertainment for such as can appreciate art of acting and staging.

"Love Everlasting"

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THE Italian love of beauty and the Italian sense of art are pleasantly demonstrated in many parts of this six-part feature by the Gloria Company. The gradual rise from the pathetic to the tragic, developed on strong dramatic lines, forms the greatest merit of this play. There are two stories in the films and it seemed to me as if the preliminary story had perhaps been spun out to disproportionate length, but this defect, if it be one, may be cured with any good pair of scissors.

The feature is remarkable for its introduction of Lydia Borelli, an Italian actress of note and of pleasing forceful personality joined to histrionic talents of no mean order. The part she plays has a touch of Isolde in it and she rises to her difficult task with consummate art. The part of the hero was, I think, poorly cast by the author of the story and Mario Bonnard, who made such a striking Satan, failed to help it any. He halted and hesitated when he should have throbbed with passion and he seemed unable to control even a small register of emotions. He was the only disappointment, however, as every other part down to the humblest was rendered most adequately.

The plot is comparatively simple. The daughter of an officer is banished from her country because her father had lost papers important to the state. The banishment was made more bearable to the girl because her father, in his despair, had killed himself. She develops great musical talents and we see her on the operatic stage in various parts. She meets the prince of the country from which she had been exiled and they fall in love with each other. When they learn of each other's identity, they resolve to part, but love is stronger than all the power of cruel circumstance. The woman, rather than give up the man she loves, gives up her life and dies on the stage of a poison which slowly drank up her life-blood.

It must be added that the photography and the settings, most of the latter being outdoor, are deserving of unstinted praise. Like other European features, this production has at times a tendency to drag and if a few hundred feet could be sacrificed, I am sure the story would become dramatically stronger and more acceptable.

WILKERSON BUILDING PICTURE HOUSE.

N. A. Wilkerson, sole lessee and manager of the Tabb Opera House, Mt. Sterling, Ky., is remodeling one of that city's most centrally located buildings into a first class picture house. No name has yet been selected for the new house, and Mr. Wilkerson is considering offering a cash prize for a suitable name. In addition to the pictures which will be shown in the new theater, Mr. Wilkerson has decided to use a couple of vaudeville acts to complete the program.

OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

SEATED in a well-known cafe frequented by the theatrical fraternity on New Year's Eve were two actors of the old school, each with his favorite bottle and glass within easy reach. Apparently, they were contented and happy, but the appearances were deceiving. Their conversation attested this. One of them had just laid aside a newspaper, heaving a deep sigh. To his companion he said: "John, what are we going to do? I feel like a shipwrecked sailor on a raft in mid-ocean. Theaters all around me, and not a job in sight. Happy New Year, eh? I can't see it. How hollow the greeting sounds to me to-night. The only people in our line who can give expression to it with genuine feeling are those who are signed up with some healthy motion picture company. That's the game of the day, and I've tried to get in on it, but at every studio there is a long waiting list. There is no use denying it, the movies have put our business on the bum; and the little they have left us seems to be gradually slipping away to the cabaret places. Take up the newspapers and see how the cabarets are crowding the theaters for advertising space. Their announcements are growing as steadily in size as the theater advertisements are shrinking. And the movies are outstripping both lines with comparatively no advertising. The vaudeville people try to convince us that the pictures must go some to get in on their box office receipts, but they can't kid me. Their own advertisements do not bear out their statements. Why, look! Here are Hammerstein's and the Keith houses putting on bills running from three and a half to four hours. Just think of it! Hammerstein's with a bill of twenty-two acts for next week—the first act opening at 7:45 and the last at 11:50. Bills of that length were unheard of, outside of benefits, before motion pictures got in the running. The vaudeville people were the last to feel the jolt, and they have to go some (and more, too) to keep up with the salary list. Every week there is some kind of an anniversary at the houses. Their advertising managers are cutting out their meals to get enough time to devise something that will hold the people. And when they have been driven to this, what can we hope for in the legitimate business, with our higher prices?"

"Yes," said John, "I guess you have the right dope. A friend of mine is interested in a big picture house that is to be opened soon and he has offered me a position as manager. I think I will put away my make-up box and take the job. The worst is yet to come for us fellows. Wait until the photoplay people break in on Broadway. Many people are skeptical of the results, but I look upon the venture as a solar plexus blow for us. Why, the photoplay people have everything on the old managements in point of expense, aside from the leasing terms. For a long time I was of the opinion that the pictures would not become our actual competitors until the talking pictures reached the stage of perfection, but my mind is changed now. The people who are about to break into Broadway with the silent play know what they are doing. Make no mistake about that. The photoplay is no longer an experiment, or innovation. It has the people going, and that counts for something at the start. Then, you must understand, they are not going into this big movement solely for the box office receipts. Every success made on Broadway means big money for the photoplays throughout the country; and, believe me, the day is not far distant when there will be a chain of such theaters extending from coast to coast. Can you realize what that means, Joe? A chain of theaters running simultaneously one photoplay produced with only the cost of one cast—the original bunch at the studio. There's a phase of combination that the Sherman anti-trust law does not reach, my boy. Take it from me, as one of the greatest managers of the day said not long ago, those moving picture people have opened the eyes of theatrical promoters to more than they ever dreamed of."

A third party joined in the conversation at this point and coincided in all the others had said with the reservation that, in spite of the glowing outlook furnished by the conditions, there still existed an element of failure that should be taken into account. "For instance," said he, "no matter how much care and expense may be devoted to a photoplay, it must stand the crucial public test as the regular productions do, and one cannot tell what the people will endorse before they have seen it." "Very true," said John, "yet not conclusive. If a regular play proves a failure after months of preparation and the expenditure of thousands of dollars the loss is a total one and the house goes dark. With the photoplay the element of failure differs. The play may fail on Broadway, but it does not go upon the shelf and there is no storage to pay for an indefinite period on scenery and costumes. The failure to get a Broadway endorsement will not kill a photoplay for circulation in the ordinary picture houses and a switch to a new production can be made in the theater on a few hours' notice by the substitution of reels. If I had the opportunity I would take a chance with the picture people in this new venture. Past performances, as the racetrack fans say, have blazed a promising outlook for them. Get this in your head: Not a motion picture venture made in any of the large houses of this city since the first introduction of 'Paul Rainey's African Hunt' has been a failure."

In addressing the Authors' Club of this city on New Year's Eve, Commodore J. Stuart Blackton, of the Vitagraph Company of America, made a strong bid for coöperation on the part of well-known writers in elevating the quality of scenarios for photoplays. The Commodore always gets the right punch in his addresses. He pointed out to the authors that, besides getting good royalties from that source, they would so effectively advertise their works that the royalties from publications in book form would be vastly increased over the amount received when the works are issued in the usual manner. It can be inferred from Mr. Blackton's remarks that the time is drawing near when the works of the many freakish script writers will have practically no market in the higher spheres of the motion picture world. This will be a great relief to the manuscript departments of the higher class studios, which are flooded with contributions that consume much valuable time fruitlessly. There is a great demand for original and novel ideas, and it is with the hope of discovering them that the script reviewers go over everything that comes to hand. But there is not one contributor in a score or more who presents something new and novel. The average writer starts out with one aim in view—to find out how scenarios should be prepared. Having learned this, qualification is assumed and stories are dumped upon the hands of producers devoid of originality or novelty. As the amateur players have been displaced by the professionals, so will the amateur writers pass by. The effrontery of some of the latter is almost shocking at times. One of them recently made a personal call at a studio to express indignation over the return of his script. "Why," said he, "you people do not know a good thing when you see it. I'll prove it to you. My play is a duplicate of one of the greatest successes on the screen to-day, only I have transformed the characters and scenes. The story is exactly the same." To which the manager replied: "That is our reason for rejecting your script."

That is the same reason why people complain sometimes that the producers do not get away from each other in the making up of stories. An original script sold to one company is transformed for sale to a second. Many amateurs, after seeing a play on a screen, change the dates and scenes of action, transform the characters, and then submit the script as an original. Frequently, the original film has escaped the notice of the manuscript reader and he innocently adopts the lemon. This transformation business is a scheme to replace the old trick of selling the same script to more than one company. Incidentally, it may be remarked that trick authors are not alone the guilty parties. Unfortunately, there are producers who deliberately plagiarize successful productions, thus saving the expense of paying for manuscripts and maintaining a manuscript staff. In almost every case where this is done the interlopers kill the subject and hurt the business. Why not prosecute the infringers? To do this, every studio would be obliged to have a legal department, and each one would be overworked, with nothing more than a slap on the wrist imposed on the offender.

FILM MEN RETURN FROM THE HUNT.

Several prominent Philadelphia film men recently went into the wilds of Pike County, Pennsylvania, with the avowed object of hunting deer. The party included Mr. Harry Schwalbe, of the General Film Company; Lou Bache, of the same concern; Theodore Beck, James McCaffrey, of the Novelty Amusement Company, and John Harold O'Hannon. The nimrods were consistently silent upon the subject of their spoils when they returned to the city of Brotherly Love. It was rumored that Mr. O'Hannon had been chased for miles by an indiscreet and short-sighted bear.

HANDSOME NEW PICTURE HOUSE OPENED.

The Log Cabin is the name of a new motion picture theater opened recently in Nashville, Tenn. It is located at 237 Fourth Avenue, N. The theater derives its name from its rustic appearance. The house has a seating capacity of 200 persons, and is operated by the Foster Novelty Manufacturing Company. Will Waller is in active charge of the house.

Foreign Trade Notes

BRITISH NOTES.

(Special Correspondence to THE WORLD.)

IT is interesting to note the trend of advertising in the sphere of moving pictures, particularly at this season of the year. About fifty or sixty per cent. of the manufactures in this country prefer to stick—like the cobbler to his last—to the good old fashioned calendar with its customary olegraph and seasonable wording. Mr. Smith, the manager of the Vitagraph establishment, has, however, made a bold bid to clear from mediocrity by presenting his clients with an artistic portfolio to hold the weekly bulletin of releases of his company.

I mentioned some time ago that a producing firm in London was constructing a moving picture revue of the best turns in the many variety-stage revues now on the Metropolitan theater boards. O. J. Raush is the producer and most of the scenes which introduce stage favorites have already been completed. The subject will be released early in the new year.

In the Chancery division of the Law Courts last week an action was heard for the revocation of the "Kinemacolor" patent. Mr. G. A. Smith, F. R. A. S. of Southwick, was the patentee and Bioschemes, Ltd., were the petitioners, while the National Color Kinematograph, Ltd. (the owners of Mr. Smith's letters patent), were the respondents. Counsel for the respondents explained the working of the patent known as "Kinemacolor." Counsel for the petitioners stated that they alleged insufficiency in the patentee's specifications and also anticipation of his invention. It was also stated that the material part of the invention had been obtained from Dr. E. F. Green and Mr. Wm. Friese-Greene. The latter said that in March or April, 1905, while at Brighton, he secured moving colored pictures through a revolving disc in two colors. Approximately natural colors resulted. The case was adjourned at this juncture to give the judge an opportunity of seeing the patent under dispute.

George Alexander Redford, the president of the British Board of Film Censors, states that there is an increasing demand for English travel films. If this be true, and Mr. Redford should be in an admirable position to judge, then I should say it is a demand for which there are few immediate chances of satiation. Travel films from America, Europe and even of the Sandwich Islands we have by the score, but an English travel film in a moving picture program over here is a comparitive rarity. Possibly some explanation of the shortage may be found in the present keen competition for long melodramatic pictures, but surely the excuse given me by one producer that "travels" don't pay is scarcely feasible. No subject is less costly to produce than travel or scenic films. In fact, the salient feature of the "travel" is that it requires no production. Yet the British scenic or travel picture remains to be properly exploited and for the firm that successfully accomplishes this there is an uncontested field. I have seen "travels" by the score from France, Germany and the U. S. A., but I have never seen a travel of the English Lake District, the Scottish Highlands, the Yorkshire Moors, or the West Coast of Ireland.

By the time this letter appears in print one of the oldest film producers of this country will have arrived in New York on a short business tour. Will Barker, of the Barker Co., of London, will be accompanied by Mr. Ed. Laurillard and their business, I am told, concerns the exhibition and disposal in the U. S. A. of "Sixty Years a Queen," the Barker Co.'s historical masterpiece which was recently released on this side. As a producer, Mr. Barker makes one or two unique claims that will interest the American trade. He states that he was the first man to issue an exclusive film and to produce what are now known as split-reels.

An advertising agency in the metropolis is seeking to monopolize moving picture shows as a new medium. They draw out for exhibitors printed agreements which specify that in return for a consideration of about $150 per year the exhibitor will include in his program a film provided by the agency. Obviously the film provided constitutes an advertisement of some kind or other and the fact that I have to record the success of the idea does not stand exactly as a testimony to the principles of the exhibitors concerned.

GEORGE SCOTT.

George Scott, for many years technical foreman of the Melies Company, has recently returned to New York after an adventurous trip of two years around the world in search of the bizarre and curious cities, villages and customs of various peoples to record in moving pictures. In his travels he has traversed thirty-eight thousand miles in every mode of conveyance imaginable by land and water, in palanquins, sedan chairs, pousse-pousses, in sampans, on rafts, on a wheelbarrow, on donkeys, camels, in the springless char-a-boefs, on elephants, etc. In the great elephant hunt of Cambodia he was injured, but, with the able assistance of Mr. Leo Pierson and Mr. Henry Buckland his indefatigable helpers, he was brought out of the forests and in the governor's special launch was taken to the hospital just in time to save his life. Mr. Scott and his party met with the greatest courtesy everywhere in Cambodia and the utmost kindness from the governors and great officials down, and as a pleasing souvenir each received a decoration from the king.

A WELL-KNOWN ITALIAN FILM MAN.

One of the best known film men of Southern Italy is Signor Raffaele Mazza, of Naples, who has just opened up splendid offices at 4 Calata S. Marco dei Ferrari in that city. Sig. Mazza is thoroughly conversant with the film situation in Italy and is ready to act for any American firm that may seek representation in those parts. He is in a position to exploit any American-made films which have never before been shown in Italy. Sig. Mazza is recommended by the accomplished editor of Cinema, Sig. Alfred Morvillo.

NEW THEATER PLANNED.

R. F. Shimer, of Burlingame, Cal., has leased the new picture house which is to be built on Burlingame Avenue, that city, by G. W. Gates. Mr. Shimer, who is an experienced showman, will incorporate vaudeville in his program. The new house will be up to date in every respect and will have a large stage, balcony and boxes.

A Letter to Bill.

JUST to head off comment, Bill is not his real name at all. When his wife talks to him she calls him Harry and you can gamble that he answers, but now and then we are going to drop a line to Harry and call him Bill, because he doesn't care what we call him. Harry—or Bill—has just bought a house somewhere between Salt Lake and the fresh water lakes, and, seeing as how he's a friend of ours, we're going to try and head him in straight if we burst a lung or smash a typewriter. There are a lot of people in the same position as Bill and these letters are given here for their benefit and in the hope that they will help others than the William whose name is Harry.

Here it Begins.

Dear Bill:

Glad to see that you've bought a house for a Christmas present to yourself even if there are others in the back part of the shop as silent partners. They call them silent partners because they talk more than the man whose name is on the door or the door mat. Whatever the name is, the ostensible partner is the door mat, for every silent partner thinks he knows more of the game than the active man, and the advice you'll get is more than plenty. And as though you were not getting enough, here is some more.

I take it that you've bought a house that has been run down at the heel by the last man in. You don't tell me just how it has been run down, whether through the program, the service or the general conduct of the house, but I note that something is wrong and that you must win them back. It's on the winning back that I want to talk to you.

Pulling Up.

You are like all others who have gone this way before you. You have heard that there is good money in getting hold of a good location that has been run down and building it up. You've induced five other men to think your way and put up their pro-rata and it is up to you to get the money back for them and for your own bank balance. You're a game enough sport to see your own money fade without letting out more than one yelp to every eleven dollars that vanishes, but there are some men who will make more noise over a wented ten-cent piece than Charlie Gates would let out over a vanished thousand when a horse stops to get his shoes blacked on the back-stretch instead of coming home first. With five partners it's a cinch that you have at least one of these bad losers. With five partners it's a cinch if you have only one.

You can't talk to these fellows about playing a waiting game. They think that all they have to do is to put up a thousand and go to the bank Monday and draw down fifteen hundred profits. It's going to be hard to convince them that you were not joking when you said that the profits would be slow at first. They heard you say it, but they know of lots of cases where a shoe string has been run up into a pair of hip boots in a couple of weeks, and they do not realize that this was some few years ago.

They'll have you well nigh crazy for a time and you'll be ready to do almost anything to shut them up.

The quickest way to get rich is to deal in filth. Sensation is what the people want, and they'll buy it if you offer it. You can boost business a couple of hundred a day with something noisy in the way of a film and posters still more loud and I'd hate to tell you what you can make—for a little time—with the "White Slave" films.

Perhaps

And mind you, these "White Slave" films teach a strong moral lesson. Bless your heart, they teach a strong moral lesson. They've got the Sunday school licked three ways and up in the air when it comes to handing out a strong moral lesson, but a fairly close touch on the situation here in New York leads me to the belief that the strong moral lesson thing means more in the advertisements and the press stuff than it does in the theater. The "White Slave" films may teach a strong moral lesson until the cows come home and go back again, but the trouble is that they only teach the strong moral lesson on paper and not in the theater.

The other night a couple of chaps went up to see the film that's been raided. The best he got was a cell and the only comment he made as he came out was—"Is that all!" He wasn't looking for a moral lesson, he was looking for a lot of ladies in short skirts or no skirts at all, and when he came out he felt that he had been swindled. Maybe he got a moral lesson, but he wasn't looking for moral lessons, he was looking for ladies, and he didn't see as much of them as he expected to. He saw a lot of crude, sordid, vulgar stuff, but it was not half as good as a burlesque show and it cost almost as much. He was looking for a sensation and he got the bee and he'll ever after blame you and not the film for stinging him. You've got his coin—once, but it is the last penny you will ever get from him.

Then you'll get a lot of small boys and young girls, small boys of seventeen to twenty who sit alongside the young girls and look at them while they look at the film. They are not looking for moral lessons, they're looking for sensation, and they are getting it, because they are very young and very green. They think they are "seeing life," when it is not life, but moral death they are looking at.

And Then Again.

And then, again, Bill, you must count on the church people. They won't come to the show, so they won't see the moral lesson. They'll simply mark you down as a fellow to keep away from, and they'll whale the life out of any kiddie of theirs they ever find coming out of your house. They will feel that they can contribute all the moral lessons their offsprings will need and they will want to hand them out in their own way. They may want to start on some of the other ten commandments before they tackle the seventh and they won't thank you for anticipating their school course; not a bit of it. Instead they are far more likely to complain to the mayor or the police, and these, being more or less sophisticated, will know just how much you are thinking of the moral lesson and just how much you have the box office in mind—and they won't give you the benefit of the doubt; not with the papers standing ready to give them double column stories if they do the raid stuff and never a line if they stand in with you.

After that you could put in "From the Manger to the Cross" with every clergyman in town lecturing the reels and you could not raise the ban of some of these who have you on their black books. You've pulled in a lot of quarters quick, but for every quarter you get in a hurry you lose a few dollars that would be coming in ten or twenty cents a week for the next few years. The sensation thing is all right if you've only rented the house for a week and are going to leave town on the Midnight Saturday, but it's not good medicine for you, Bill, if you want to keep on doing business at the same stand, and I don't give a hoot what your backers may say.

I've been through this sensation stuff more than once, Bill. I remember when John B. Dorris put on "Orange Blossoms" at the old Princess Theater that started out as the home of the San Francisco Minstrels, changed to Herrman's and wound up by being Sam T. Jack's. When Dorris died he was broke and he got about five lines of obituary. He made money with the undressing stuff, but it didn't last.

I saw the "Golden Statues" at the Casino years before that, but they didn't have anything stronger to follow the gilded ladies, and so they lost money. I was behind the scenes when a big vaudeville man started to lick things here. He began with the Salome dance and wound up with a lady with no clothes and the sheriff just outside his office door. He could not build sensation on sensation past the point where the police would stand for a political pull, and so he went Bong!

There is a close comparison between sensation and cheese, Bill. There comes a time when the Board of Health won't stand for the age of the Roquefort, but you can't lead them back to start on a fresh cheese that's just getting ripe. They want it good and green, and no other way.

Sensation is all right if you have your grip packed and your ticket bought, but if you've a lease on a house and have paid rent in advance it's bad medicine and you can't help it any by saying it teaches a strong moral lesson. Run a good house in a cleanly fashion and stave the kickers off and at the end of the year your partners will thank you, no matter what they say to you now or whether they'll even talk to you. One times a quarter is twenty-five cents. Fifty-two times ten is $5.20. Which do you want? You can have your choice.

Not Limited.

We are writing this primarily for Bill, but if you want a letter, sing out. If you have something of general interest in matters of management we'll be glad to write Bill about it. He is just starting out—and there is lots that he has to learn yet, though very probably he thinks he knows it all.

Scrapping in Valdosta.

Things have been burning down in Valdosta, Ga., where Frank Montgomery runs in opposition to the Grand, though the Grand is a favorite Montgomery title. The Grand is run by J. B. Ham, with R. J. Tindell, as manager.

The Grand started the ball rolling by advertising the "great original Pasquali production," of "The Last Days of Pompeii." It had two days of it when H. N. Hunt, the Montgomery manager, came out with a wire from George Kleine and the announcement that this was the only original production. The Grand countered with a half-page advertisement stating that the Kleine production was not an imitation, but "a smaller production planned for the smaller theaters."

We think that both sides displayed a lack of dignity in this exchange of "only original" and "imitation" stuff. Most intelligent people are able to reason it out that Bulwer Lytton wrote "Pompeii" some years ago, and can deduce that one could not very well be an imitation of the other since the novel is common property. In consequence the question of original and imitation does not enter, but even if it did, the main question is "Which is the best?" and this is the only factor that interests the public. Fight advertising should be directed along these lines, not in decrying the wares of another, but in booming the stuff the advertiser has to sell.

The Grand ran its "Pompeii" on Christmas Day. The Montgomery had the Kleine on Saturday and Monday. It's a safe bet that most of the town turned out to see both and decide which really was the better, so that no one really got hurt. We think that in a small town two theaters might get together and play this scheme for a clean up instead of making bad blood by fighting, but where a fight is on, it is better to pay to boom your own show than to decry the other attraction.

Some of the old timers may hark back to the days when "The Crowing Hen" and the "Bridal Trap" were playing at New York theaters across the way from each other and, oddly enough, at the very houses where the two versions of "Pompeii" were shown, Wallack's and the Bijou. At first McCall and Duff scrapped, but in the end the scrapping was more or less a prearranged affair designed to hold up the interest in a not very good comic opera that ran long beyond its indicated season just because of the rivalry. That was twenty-five or thirty years ago, but it still holds good.

Spend money to advertise yourself; not to advertise the other fellow. That is good only for the newspapers and the job printer.

In Greeting.

The Empress Theater, Gordon, Neb., sends in a Christmas greeting, and Manager Poggenpohl explains:

> I inclose sample of advertising for the holiday week. Understand, please, there is only a weekly publication here, for newspaper ad. Usual way this is handled is dodgers; but during the holiday when a good many students are home and unusually large crowds are expected, I handle it direct through mail. This greeting and program was mailed on 24th, so was received by 25th. In your criticism kindly remember that this editor is sorely in need of new type.

The printing is in green and red on gray, and while the type is a bit battered, it might be a lot worse. The front of the cover carries this verse:

> Good friend of ours, for thee we pray
> All goodly things this Christmas Day.
> All goodly things thy life to bless,
> In these two words—"Just Happiness."
> —Empress Theater.

Inside are the announcements of programs from Christmas Day to the following Tuesday, which includes "Oliver Twist" for Christmas night, with a special and different program in the afternoon, "From the Manger to the Cross," and "The Price of Human Lives."

There is considerable effect in the printing; too much ink on the forms, but the type display is restrained and effective because of that restraint, a red two-point border and two ornaments being the only supplements to the cut-off dashes. It doesn't look like one of those cheap jobs where the compositor dumps in everything the office has purchased since it opened, and because of the simplicity it will impress even those who do not know why they are impressed.

It is a mistake to load a job down with ornaments. Something, now and then, is needed to break white spaces or mark a break in the copy, but when the ornamentation overlays the type, the job ceases to be effective.

Looking Back.

Now and then it pays to remind the patrons that previous tips have been well placed. We take this from the Gem Bulletin, Pittsburgh:

> "Victory" proved all we claimed for it, don't you think so? The crowds that saw this wonderful war drama last Wednesday and Thursday evidently were pleased, to judge by the hearty applause at times.

Of course your readers know when you have told them truly, but remind them now and then that you have spoken straightly and the new announcements will receive the greater credit.

Helping the Paper Help You.

James B. Bowker has been working in with the paper, with the usual result. How own letter tells the scheme very completely:

> The local newspaper here, the Star, and myself today completed a publicity stunt that might interest your readers. The advertising manager of the West Chester Star, LeRoy H. Snyder, approached me about a week ago and offered to exchange extra space for the free use of the theater on Friday afternoon after Christmas. The Star for the past few days has printed a coupon in its columns which was redeemed at their office for a free admission ticket. The first day the coupon appeared, hundreds of tickets were given out and on the two succeeding days hundreds more were disposed of. I used the screen in giving further publicity to the affair and the outcome of the affair was a tremendous crowd this afternoon. Before the doors opened the crowd was so large that I had a local photographer take a picture of the crowd. I gained a number of new friends and a tremendous amount of publicity, as many had never before been inside of the theater. I will endeavor the next time to make arrangements of a similar nature, as nothing in a publicity way has seemed to attract so much attention as this stunt. If you wish, you can publish an account of this, as some other manager may want to try it out.

This is something we have advocated more than once. Dean R. Daynes, of the Mission Theater, Salt Lake City (is he still in the business?) used to work in with the papers constantly, and his advertising bills were as small as his space was large and everyone was pleased. Work in with the papers wherever you can. If they are getting up a subscription for some popular cause, give them ten dollars and set aside some matinee or offer them matinee tickets to be used as rewards. Suggest the use of matinee tickets as prizes for their want ad business, one scheme being a prize to every person who discovers enough misspelled words in the want ads to spell the name of the theater or the paper. Unless you play to packed business at the matinees you cannot put the empty seats to better use and you'll get all sorts of good advertising.

Just So.

"He knows his business, but I know mine," is the way Elmer H. Greenberg, of the Gem, Philadelphia, explains how he gets the best results from his printer. His letter runs:

> I am inclosing you a copy of the first program that I ever issued for my house, trusting that you will find space to give it a criticism. My formula for managing a photoplay theater since I undertook to make the Gem pay my way through an engineering course at the University of Pennsylvania has been: "First procure a good show and then let the people know about it." I dog my printer, who is also my neighbor, into giving me just what I want. He knows his business, but I know mine, also, and with my knowledge of type values, we generally succeed in our effort to impress the people. By the way, what do you think of a cheap device by means of which slides may be written while they are being projected on the screen?

Answering the latter paragraph first, we hardly think that the demand for such a slide device would repay the cost of putting it on the market. There are several reasonably priced devices of this sort, but few are used, though clearly a slide in process of being written will attract more attention and make a more lasting impression than one merely flashed, but there is no utilization made of the current devices in this direction, so why add another?

The program is merely a four-page leaflet, four by seven. It is capitally set and while the size prevents very great display, the matter is so attractively set forth that style replaces black type. One violation of make-up rules is the use of a heavier dash under the date than that used to cut off the divisions of the program, a two-point solid rule being used under the date and a double line two-point between days. This has the effect of cutting off the date from the program it applies to. It is a very minor fault, but about the only point for criticism. Other than that we can offer small comment. This is not an ambitious program, but it is a clean and effective piece of printing, as any printing is bound to be where the manager does not have to rely on the printer for his typographical knowledge.

Reverse English.

J. E. Tierney, of Sioux City, uses a set of Jesse James heralds to advertise the "Panama Canal" feature at his Scenic Theater. At first glance it would seem that the house was about to revert to the atrocious outlaw stuff, but the red ink at the bottom of the page, just below a cut showing a Mexican about to fix the late Mr. James up for the coroner announces:

> SCENIC THEATER
> But will you encourage the production > and showing of such subjects as the > PANAMA CANAL SERVICE ?

At first glance it may seem to be a far cry from the James film to the Panama Canal, but it works well—once. Most persons who would be attracted by the canal stuff are of the sort that will resent the James pictures and the use of the James advertising will rivet their attention more quickly than would the Panama announcement. Then, when the "sell" becomes apparent, the fact of the educational sinks in. The canal stuff, it would seem, is a weekly change of slides. We do not like the weekly feature. The change should be more frequent, but otherwise the scheme seems to be all right.

Bully!

Now and then some manager pleads that he must use vaudeville "because the others do," which is no excuse whatever. The better way is that of the Grand Theater, Rochester, N. Y. In their newspaper advertising they use a cut head, white letters on black that reads:

> The Grand
> High Class Photoplays
> Uninterrupted by imitation vaudeville

You don't have to use vaudeville because the other man does if you have the right sort of house and know how to run it. If the other man uses thirty or forty dollars' worth of vaudeville, argue that there must be intelligent persons who do not care for that sort of vaudeville and cater to them instead of trying to split the vaudeville drag with the other fellow. This would be a most unhappy world if all the shops were shoe stores, or butcher shops or bakeries instead of the mixed trades. If you went into a small town and found two meat markets and no bakery, would you try a third meat market or would you try a bakery, provided you knew both businesses? It's the same way in amusements. If you cater to the same crowd the other man has, you'll merely share his business instead of tapping a fresh field. We certainly would admire to shake hands with the manager of the Grand.

Close to the Limit.

How would you regard eleven reels of pictures, and five vaudeville acts —with some pure food distributions on the side—for five cents? Two reels of pictures and one vaudeville act for each penny of your nickel ! ! ! Pretty close to the limit, isn't it? That's what is doing at the American Theater, New Orleans. One evening the bill included "The Last Days of Pompeii" and two two reel features and another night the five reels of "Satan." Satan should feel at home around there.

Another Krause Card

Building up on the sheet of thirty hand-colored gelatine-photo cards of licensed players, the Kraus Company has started a new series with similar cards of Mary Fuller and Crane Wilbur, the Fuller card carrying a large central portrait in Miss Fuller's favorite pose and nine smaller character poses. They cost but little and look a lot more than they cost. Other favorites will follow in rapid order.

A Feature List.

Tuttle and Hauck, of the Postville Theater, Postville, Iowa, have not yet grown up to the weekly program, but they send a very neat vest pocket folder from an old but good idea. It is on brown card done in black and carries the title "How we lost a patron." The inside of the folder explains that he died, which has been given here before. The back page lists the features for December, giving only the multiple reel stuff. Where a weekly program is out of the question this is the next best, and the card is so neatly done that we hope that they will presently grow up to a weekly.

He Didn't Die.

Melvin G. Winstock, of the People's Amusement Company, Portland, Ore., didn't die, like the patron above, but he seems to have some foolish idea that we have lost our interest in advertising and it is only about every six months that he shoots in a stingy little press clipping. This time the clip relates to the opening of a new house. We would be interested in hearing and seeing how he advertised the new house. That would interest us more than the press clipping. We wonder will he take the hint!

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Plenty, Thanks.

OUR recent request for the printed matter of the fake schools has been so promptly met by our friends that we are no longer in need of back number stuff, though we are always glad to see the newest outbreaks of these photoplay pedagogues. One Philadelphia writer sent us twenty ounces of letters and circulars.

It is evident that with a single exception there is no such thing as a standard price for tutelage, for each school has follow-up letters that gradually reduce the price to various sums ranging from fifty to twenty per cent. of the original. As one correspondent cleverly put it, "I am holding off to see if they won't give me five dollars as an inducement to study their lessons."

The Jones Series.

Owing to other matters Marc Edmund Jones could not continue his western studio series in time for the last issue, but we print this week the second of the series and will print one a week for four more weeks, completely covering the Pacific coast field in a practical way from the point of view of an actual free lance writer. This is the first time that the western field has been so exhaustively covered, and we, along with the rest of the writers, are grateful to Mr. Jones for his courtesy.

A Swindle Checked.

On December 21 a former employee of the Universal was arrested in Los Angeles charged by Marc Edmund Jones with having sought to dispose of his script, "Hatred's Endless Chain," and it is hinted that the arrest will lay bare a wholesale theft.

Mr. Jones submitted his story to the Kalem Company and when they were unable to use it, he sent it to the Universal. Presently it was returned to the Kalem office from Los Angeles by "G. G. Paul," and was recognized by Phil Lang, who communicated with Carl Laemmle and Mr. Jones. Mr. Laemmle very promptly took the matter up with Mr. Bernstein, manager of the Pacific coast studios with instructions to get at the root of the matter, with the result as stated above.

The Universal has footed the entire expense of the long investigation and has made it very ———— its attitude in the matter. The authors owe thanks both to Mr. Laemmle and Mr. Bernstein for their prompt and efficient action.

The Los Angeles Mutual Studios.

By Marc Edmund Jones.

The Mutual Film Corporation has two studios in Los Angeles, aside from the studios of the New York Motion Picture Company, whose connection with the Mutual is by contract only, and in addition to the studio of the American Film Manufacturing Company, which is a hundred miles up the coast at Santa Barbara, Cal. The Majestic studio is on top of the hill at Brooklyn Heights, just a short distance over the Los Angeles river and commanding a splendid view over the north end of the city. It is the old Thanhouser plant, and is well equipped with permanent frame buildings and one large open air stage. The Reliance studio is the old Kinamacolor plant at 4500 Sunset Boulevard, in Hollywood, and it has just been taken over two days previous to the writing of this article. This plant is roomier than the Majestic, and is as well equipped.

Any article on the Mutual movements is apt to be incorrect by the time of publication, because of the re-organization of the studios by David W. Griffith. Indications are that the Majestic plant will not be disturbed, but future plans at the new Reliance yard are unsettled as yet. Griffith, together with a large company of players and at least one other director, is due to arrive possibly before the first of February, and it is probable that Frank E. Woods and the scenario bureau will be brought with him. Announcement as to whether to submit to New York in that case, or to Los Angeles, or to both, will be made in the trade papers. In the meantime, the Majestic studio continues to read for its own wants, and the Reliance studio will not yet be of interest to the photoplaywright, as Director W. C. Cabanne, now in charge, states that it is the intention of Mr. Griffith that they both confine themselves to multiple reel productions of copyrighted works, so that the name of the author may assist in the exploitation of the production. At a later date a director will be put to work making 1,000-foot farce comedy, and scripts for him will be read by the Mutual bureau at its advertised address.

The Majestic studio is in charge of Head Director Lucius J. Henderson. Working with him are Directors Albert Hale, John O'Brien and John Adolfi. The Majestic policy does not favor the exploitation of any particular player, which means that the story is the thing, and that nearly any type of story is apt to find favor at Majestic. The principal players at this writing are Billy Garwood, Lamar Johnstone, Francelia Billington, Billie West and Jessalyn Van Trump.

The scenario head at Majestic is Philip Lonergan, a brother of Lloyd Lonergan, who writes most of the Thanhouser stories. Philip Lonergan, before his transfer to Los Angeles upon the taking over of the Majestic brand by Thanhouser, was associated with his brother at the New Rochelle plant, and was the author of many of the Thanhouser stories. Since coming to Los Angeles he has been absolutely responsible for all the Majestic stories, buying and revising, or writing them himself. Upon going over a list of recent releases, approximately half were from his pen, the rest being bought from outside writers. He carries the title of Editor, but in position he carries more power than usual with the editor, as the director must produce the story given to him, and must produce it exactly as it has been edited by the editor. This condition works admirably in the case of Majestic, as Lonergan makes a practice of co-operating with the director, and has the director go over each script with him until it meets with the approval of both. In case of a disagreement, however, Lonergan has the power, and so there is a definite responsibility. This results in a certain "atmosphere" in Majestic releases, and the screen is a criterion of their wants. Send scripts to Majestic Studios, 651 Fairview Avenue, Los Angeles.

McCardell Knows Them.

Roy L. McCardell, who'll write you anything from a cigarette advertisement to a grand opera and who was the first and still one of the most prolific photoplay writers, is doing a series of articles in the New York Sunday World on the various means of earning a living by writing, and his first article is one of the few really sane articles on photoplay work that has been printed by a daily paper. Most of these articles have dealt with the vast profits to be made, but Mr. McCardell sizes up the situation frankly and honestly and holds out small inducement to the novice. We regret that we cannot give space to the entire article, but this excerpt gives the essence of the whole:

> Frank Woods, a scenario editor, announced recently that within several months (Really about six weeks.—E. W. S.) he had examined 7,000 moving picture manuscripts (or scenarios, as they are called), written by amateur authors, and only ten of all these could be used, and then only after being rewritten.
> Mrs. Marion Brandon, editor for another film company, long ago gave up hope that any untrained scenario writer had any message for her, and she will not read manuscripts of picture ideas unless submitted by those who have had at least three moving picture ideas previously accepted.
> Yet every person that can wield a pen or borrow a lead pencil is writing scenarios.
> The prices paid for acceptable ideas have gone up from $5 and $10 to $50 and over, but the moving picture companies are compelled to depend mainly upon scenario writers on salary. It is doubtful, with everybody trying to write moving pictures, if there are over a hundred persons in the United States who as free lances write moving pictures with any monetary success worth while. Of these hundred persons it is safe to say that not ten of them but were trained newspaper men, magazine contributors or playwrights. One of these supposititious ten was a retired army officer of fine mental attainments and another a railroad man of keen perceptions, who has specialized on railroad pictures, of which he knows the practical side and of which he has brains to imagine the romance.
> Let the name of a supposedly successful writer of moving picture scenarios be printed in that connection and he or she is flooded with a shower of manuscripts from the amateur aspirants.
> It is in pain the practised writer tells the aspirants to read old Dr. Epps Winthrop Sargent's famous authoritative work, "The Technique of the Photoplay," and learn how—they do not want to work and study, the amateur doesn't; he or she wants to "dash off" some scenarios and make some easy money. It can't be done.
> There are about a hundred moving picture companies in the United States. Some twenty of these are "on the level" and are really in the market to buy moving picture scenarios from people who know how to write them.
> Yet it is doubtful if over sixty or seventy moving picture scenarios are bought "from the outside" by these honest companies week by week. The reason of this is that when any writer develops a faculty for turning words to pictures, said pictures being visualized stories of love, hate, horror, revenge, and, best of all, laughter—they, the writers, are hired at good salaries as staff scenario writers.

Police!

This from a school in San Francisco:

> Even boys and girls can learn how to write picture plays in a very short time. A boy in an office has earned from $25 to $75 monthly writing picture-play scenarios in addition to his salary as clerk. A girl in our office wrote her first play in an evening and sold it for a good sum. As one girl puts it—"Picture-play writing is just fun and it is the kind of fun that pays." There is more truth than poetry in that statement. Emmet C. Hall says he made $1,485 in one year writing picture plays.

And all you have to do is to send them two dollars now and three dollars when you have made fifty.

The literature of this concern is at the disposal of the Chief Post Office Inspector at San Francisco if he is interested. If he will write Mr. Hall in care of the Lubin Manufacturing Company, Philadelphia, Pa., he can get Mr. Hall's expert opinion as to the probability of children making $1,485 in one year.

Clearness.

Sometimes when you blame the editor for keeping your scripts too long it is because he is trying to see your story. Phil Lang said the other day, in discussing a certain writer, that he knew that there was a story in a certain script of a type he stood very much in need of at the moment, but the story was so diffusely told that he could not, without repeated readings, separate the story from the useless detail and see it as it really stood. Every editor has the same trouble. He gets a script that he knows must contain a story, but the plot is masked by useless detail until it is lost and it must be read over and over again. The plot can be discovered, but it means repeated readings at odd intervals, and so the story is held until time permits the separation of the grains of wheat from the bushels of chaff. Do not write page on page of description. Tell your story briefly in action. If your story is worth while and details are needed you will be asked to supply the deficiency, but do not, at the start, bury the action under a mass of description. Some editors, like Mr. Lang, are patient. Others are not.

Stuck and—

Not long ago a newspaper man wrote and asked us what we thought of the chances of his success as a photoplaywright. We told him the situation as we saw it and as we thought it would be, and he decided to stick. Now he writes:

> You may remember that I wrote you asking whether or not it would pay a busy person to stay in the photoplay game, and you gave me some very good advice in reply. I had intended to send you the next script I had returned for criticism, but instead of getting the last one back, I got a release from Lubin for it at $50. This was a one-reel subject, and I feel very much encouraged to get this price, which I understand is pretty close to the maximum, for the first play that I have sold, particularly in view of the fact that I have only written four altogether. That is, four complete scripts, in addition to a few synopses submitted to Mr. McCloskey by special permission.

There is a good market for good stuff, but there never was and never will be much of a market for bad stuff.

Travesty.

Travesty seems to be coming into vogue, but do not try to write travesty unless you have a keen sense of humor and a knowledge of what you are writing about.

Travesty may be divided into two general classes, travesty of things or methods in general, and travesty of some well-known writing. The latter is perhaps easier to write, but it has the handicap of being really amusing only to those who know the original.

The other day we saw a travesty of a recent two-reel release. It was funny—in spots—to those who had seen the original two-reel release, but comparatively few of the theater-goers see any particular release, and the others would wonder what it was all about. It may be advanced as a general argument that it is not possible to travesty any particular release.

So well-known a story as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" might be made the subject of travesty, and this holds true of plays like "Hamlet," "East Lynne," "Carmen" or any other widely known dramativ performance, but the list is small at best and this side it would be well to leave alone.

Methods offer a broader field. A spectator who sees such a reel as Edison's "Stuff Dreams are Made of" may not have seen "Bertha, the Sewing Machine Girl" or "Nellie, the Beautiful Cloak Model," but he does know melodramatic methods and can laugh at the good-natured fun poked at the villainous villain, the heroic hero and the virtuous heroine without reference to any particular play. If he has not seen one he has seen another and all are of a kind.

The travesty of the stage generally gains its laughs through the perversion of the lines. In photoplay the lines are not read and the laughs must come instead through the perversion of the business.

There is a very lightly defined borderland between the heavy melodrama and the lighter travesty, indeed one of the most successful melodramas, one that ran a full season in a Broadway theater, was originally planned as a travesty in which all of the ingredients of the melodrama should be worked into a single play. It read so well that a slight alteration made it a dramatic and not a farcical hit. On the other hand, more than one melodrama has been found to be a farce.

Travesty, therefore, should be clearly marked, not so much through gross exaggeration as through the definiteness of the business. To go to the Edison for an example, we have the hero run down nineteen flights of steps to save the heroine from being crushed under the weight of the safe the villain has just thrown out of the window. That, of course, is exaggerated, but it is definite. If the villain had merely held the five-ton safe in the air while the lady escaped, there would have been a laugh, but to beat a falling safe down the side of a skyscraper was unmistakable.

Where gross exaggeration is used it must be clever. It is not clever if it is merely idiotic. It requires skill to be intelligently foolish,, and this is where many fail. There must be a thought back of the laugh. If you parody the death scene in "Camille" and the doctor comes in and kicks her out of bed, it is not travesty, but horseplay. If he applies the phonograph-like stethescope to her chest, drops a nickel in her mouth and listens to the music, it is burlesque. If he feels her ankle instead of her wrist to count her pulse it is travesty. The last is a parody of a usual action. Most writers make the mistake of mixing travesty and burlesque, resorting to the latter where their invention fails and getting a hybrid product that seldom is amusing.

Jones' Statistics.

Marc Edmund Jones has a passion for statistics, and his latest compilation applies to his story number thirteen. He writes:

> I have just sold my story number 13. It sold in substantially the same form as I wrote it, but it has seen its fourth revision where I changed it about a bit so that I could keep it going. It was out just 22 times. Kalem had it four times, Biograph and Vitagraph each had it three times, but it was none of these that bought it. Edison, Selig and American each had it twice. I wrote it originally August 1, 1912, and it has been going continuously ever since.

Good Advice.

Here is part of a letter from an author whose success represents about the average writer who cannot devote his entire time to plays. It may help some of you to realize that the business is not yet a get-rich-quick concern, but is getting better:

> Had good business with the plots in November; sold four, one to ——— for $25, one to ——— for $30, and two to ——— (half-reels) for $20 and $25 respectively, making a hundred even, and have a good start on December with one sale to ——— to my credit. These knockers and tummy-achers make me peevish. Tell 'em to write something besides their troubles and they may get on. Guess I've lost a script—the first one—and I'm not going to sue anyone for damages. ——— writes that a script about which I had inquired, which had been in their hands for a long time, didn't seem to be around the studio. But this old typewriter is good for re-copying, I guess, and I have plenty of time, and possibly can improve the thing.
> One thing gratifying about my November sales is that all three companies, with which I have been doing the most business, raised the ante $5 per, which buys some smokes. Note that ——— paid me $25 per half-reel, which looks good to me. They started at $15 with me, then raised to $20, and the last one was $25. This makes twenty-five comedies in the last six months. Pretty good for a dub down here in the mesquite?

Going Up.

Lately we told of a young man who wrote George Kleine that he was getting a hundred dollars a script for his stuff, with a rising market. Evidently prices have skyrocketed since then, for in his last letter—well, here it is, just as Omer Doud sent it in, that we might share his laugh:

> Dear Mr. Kleine:
> How would you like to sell my moving picture scenarios and keep the money. This is what I want to do. I sent you a moving picture scenario to sell and you keep the money and send me a moving picture machine. You will like to do this you will be getting money ahead. The company pays me $1,000 each now. If you send me a Power's No. 6A $250 machine you will be getting $850 ahead. If you send me a Power's No. 6 $225 machine you will be getting $875 ahead. If you send me a Edengraph machine, $185, you will be getting $915 ahead. If you send me a Power's No. 5, $195, you will be getting $905 ahead. If you send me a Power's No. 5, $185, you will be getting $875 ahead. If you send me a Power's No. 5, $175 machine, you will be getting $925 ahead. You will be glad to do this. When you get some 1914 moving picture machine catalogue printed send me one. I will give you a list of companies who will buy your stories. I will be in Chicago next week, on Wednesday, 24, 1913. Let me hear from you within two days. If you can't sell my scenarios send them back to me and I will thank you for same.

Those sums in addition seem to need editing.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

G. W. B.—Essanay, Vitagraph and one or two others have announced that they are not in the market for one-reel stories other than comedies. Edison, Universal, Mutual and others still want one reels. Send stamped and addressed envelope for addresses in accordance with note above.

M. M. S.—Your paper is too thin. That would not, of itself, cause the rejection of your story, but it assuredly does not help any. Get a paper that will not permit the writing on the second page to show through the first. If you are a newspaper man, why do you expect your first six scripts to sell? Did you sell your first six fiction stories? Did you walk into a newspaper shop and take the city desk away from the editor? It is no easier to write a photoplay than a story, or to dig up real news. You must go the line and learn to cover the route. Give the editors what they want and they'll probably buy it. If they are buying what the public does not want, give them what they want, anyway. It is not for you to worry if they bankrupt the boss. When you want to know what is a "perfectly good" working plot, do not consult your newspaper associates, who know no more than you do about it. Get an opinion from someone who does know. Your letter suggests a certain complacent feeling that must be corrected if you would be successful.

W. R. B.—No answers to questions we can't answer, as we have hereinbefore explained. We have answered some of these questions before. You must read the Inquiries if you want to see the replies you ask for. We do not remember the lady playing with Mr. Kerrigan, still we do not remember that she did not. We do not discuss relationships. We have no "Englishman and the Girl" listed as a release. Give some other parts he has played. The same applies to the Biograph release. If you'll give us titles correctly and not ask if they are married, or who a player's grandfather is, the Answers Man will be tickled to death to reply, but the Inquiries are going to be closed down for a couple of weeks presently, while the Answers Man goes on an alligator hunt.

LOIS—We told you a few weeks ago that if you and others did not ask questions there would be no job for an Answers Man, and right away you stop asking questions again. It doesn't look flattering.

Technique of the Photoplay

(Second Edition)

By EPES W. SARGENT.

Not a line reprinted from the first edition, but an entirely new and exhaustive treatise of the Photoplay in its every aspect, together with a dictionary of technical terms and several sample scripts.

One hundred and seventy-six pages of actual text.

Special chapters on Developing the "Punch," Condensing the Script, Writing the Synopsis, Multiple Reel Stories, Talking Pictures, Copyrights, etc.

In cloth, two dollars. Full leather, three dollars.

By mail postpaid. Add ten cents if registration is desired.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD

17 Madison Avenue - New York City

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Operators Union Directory, I. A. T. S. E.

EACH union is entitled to have its roster of officers, meeting nights, etc., listed here once per year, free of cost. Preserve this list, as it will not be republished. The mail address of the secretary should be included, and the address of regular meeting-place, if any.

Local No. 291, Grand Rapids, Michigan.

Claud Bright, president; B. Kulms, secretary; George Lednard, treasurer; H. Chandler, business agent. Meetings held first and third Tuesday nights of each month.

Question No. 15.

Best answer will be published and names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the "Roll of Honor." Explicit permission to use name must be given or only name of city will be mentioned.

Suppose you were running a motor generator set and something went wrong with your voltmeter, so that it would not register. How would you temporarily determine the approximate voltage of the generator?

Roll of Honor.

I think that it would be well if those answering questions would study them a little more and try to catch their real meaning. There have been a number of replies to question No. 9 which show that those making them understand the proposition, but they have not really answered question No. 9, as it was asked. Taking everything into consideration I think it may be fairly said that W. L. Johnston, Toronto, Canada, did best, in that he made a drawing which really answered the question without any text matter being necessary.

Brother L. C. LaGrow, Albany, N. Y., sent in a sketch which would have answered the purpose very well, and he gave explanations for connecting two different types of motor-generator sets.

Fort Worth, Texas, sent in some good drawings and undoubtedly understands the matter thoroughly. His sketches are equally as good as brother Johnston's, but are more complicated, therefore I have given Johnston's the preference.

John Mason, Toronto, Canada, sent in a correct sketch, as did St. Paul, Minn.; Spokane, Wash., and Henry Joesten, Brooklyn, N. Y., and Chicago, Ill.

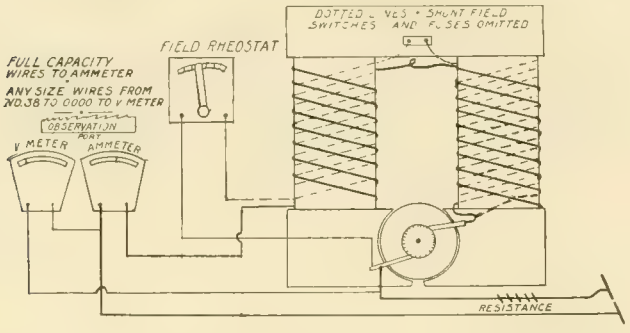
Reply to Question No. 9.

By W. L. Johnston, Toronto, Canada.

The question:

Show by drawings or sketches how you would connect the field rheostat, the voltmeter and ammeter of a motor generator set your employer purchased. What I mean by this is: suppose the device came to you without any instructions whatever accompanying it, to what and how would you connect the field rheostat, the ammeter and the voltmeter?

The answer:



DOTTED LINES + SHUNT FIELD SWITCHES AND FUSES OMITTED
FIELD RHEOSTAT
FULL CAPACITY WIRES TO AMMETER
ANY SIZE WIRES FROM NO.38 TO 0000 TO V METER OBSERVATION PORT
V METER AMMETER RESISTANCE

Worth Their Weight in Gold.

Alphonse Le May, Troy, N. Y., sends 50 cents for two copies of the questions, writes a personal letter, and winds up with:

> So far the answers to the questions have been very fine, and are worth their weight in gold to any operator.

I have many letters commending the questions, and the opposition is rapidly dwindling. I hope brother Le May will find the coming questions and answers to be of equal value with those already published. They will run a year and a half and maybe two years.

A Carbon Economizer.

W. S. Cox, New Orleans, La., has invented what he calls a carbon economizer, same being designed to allow of the burning of the stub ends of carbons down until they are an inch or less in length. Brother Cox has sent one in for examination and it is mechanically well made. I have no doubt but that it would effect a considerable saving in carbons. By using graphite liberally on the clamp screw I should say this little contrivance would enable the operator to burn his carbon stubs down to a very short length and thus really effect a considerable saving, as the average stub is from 2½ to 3 inches long.

There are, however, several things to be taken into consideration in dealing with this kind of proposition, not the least of which is the fact that the operator must have sufficient carbon, and must know that he has sufficient carbon when he starts a reel to finish the projection of that reel. It would be very much better to waste two or even three inches of carbon than to stop the show while a new carbon was inserted, owing to the miscalculation of the operator in trying to burn his stubs too close. My own opinion of this device is that it could be used to advantage in houses where the amperage is not too heavy, say up to 30 or possibly even 35. Beyond this, however, I do not think it would have any considerable value, because carbon burns away so fast on a higher amperage that the operator is unable to do any very accurate figuring. Another thing I don't quite understand is this: Presumably the device is intended to be used in the lower carbon jaw. Now if this is the case its efficiency would be considerably lessened, because this department has always advocated the use of solid carbons below when using d. c. and the longest stub of carbon is almost always at the top, and therefore a cored carbon. Of course it would be possible to use the device in the upper lamp jaw, but I am a little inclined to doubt this being a practical thing to do.

Several Kicks.

Brother R. C. Wilson, Winnipeg, Canada, sends in reply to question No. 10, and then proceeds to manufacture conservation as follows:

> Notice spoke-rimmer mentioned for sharpening carbons; have tried this tool and did not find it very satisfactory. By the way, when will some intelligent manufacturer turn out some half-inch solid carbons already pointed? What is the matter with Majestic and Thanhouser films of late? Every sub-title is out of frame with the rest of the film. The brands mentioned are usually beyond reproach, so far as photography and perforations are concerned. Do you think the following would be useful in eliminating flicker? The lens I am using has the back combination at the end of the tube, while the front combination (nearest the screen) is half way in the barrel. This leaves about two or three inches of the barrel not in use. Now, if we cut away a portion of this tube, and make a collar for the shutter, which will enable the same to set back over the end bearing of the shutter shaft, it will enable the shutter to cut the rays at a much nearer point than at present. This, of course, only applies to lenses of 4½ e. f. or under. How about it?

Personally I know of no reason why the solid carbons should not be pointed the same as the cored, and, unless I am mistaken, the Bios are pointed, though I am not sure about this. However, I will take the matter up with the manufacturers at once. I will also write to the film companies named, though I think the trouble is due to the uneven shrinkage of film stock. The Vitagraph had the same trouble recently. As to the lens matter, what you suggest would not directly help the flicker, but indirectly it might, since it would enable you to use a narrower main shutter blade, thus more nearly equalizing the width of the blade, which always tends to reduce flicker.

Light Trouble.

Park Falls, Wis., sends money for the list of questions and writes:

> Am running a Power's Six A. Get a good picture with 50 amperes, 110 volt, 133 cycle current. Cannot get the crater to form as per Handbook. At times the arc is quiet, and then again it will sputter and is very hard to control; is much better when I file the front side of the carbon flat. We run two shows a night; no day work, and I get $15.00 and work at the power plant during the day. Should the test lamp light up to candlepower on the secondary side of my transformer and go down to about half candlepower when I strike the arc?

Yes, it should, because before you strike the arc there is no current flowing on the secondary and its voltage, therefore, is the same, or practically the same as the line voltage, but as soon as the arc is struck the voltage of the secondary drops to between 30 and 35. As to the crater, I presume you mean that you are unable to get it to form as per C, Figure 98, page 209 of the Handbook. This is either due to faulty setting, poor carbons, or defective cores, though it must be admitted that it is not an easy task to maintain a perfect crater when using only 50 amperes a. c., still you should be able to do it with the Power's Six A lamp, as you can move the upper carbon to any desired position, thus forcing the crater to burn as you want it. Maybe you carry too short an arc.

Child Operator—Eighty Years Old.

W. L. Augustine, Crescent Theater, Decatur, Ill., writes thusly:

Each week I am lucky enough to make connection with a MOVING PICTURE WORLD, and immediately turn to your department for ideas which are as valuable to the exhibitor as to the operator. After eighteen years on the road, in various ventures, my wife and I finally grew tired of living in a trunk. We therefore bought a well-located lot in a suburb of this thriving city of 40,000, and on that lot now stands a brick and concrete theater, seating 530. Business was good from the start and still continues so. But much of the credit must be given to our operator, who in point of gentlemanly qualities, loyalty and carefulness cannot be surpassed. I hereby challenge the country to produce a man who is the equal of Col. Will L. Smith, veteran musician, Swiss bell ringer, and band leader, dating from 1854 to the present day. This grand old man is now past eighty, and is usually the first person on the job each night. That his work in the operating room is satisfactory is proven by the fact that each night autos from distant parts of the city line up in front of The Crescent, the word having gone forth that we show the best pictures in Decatur. Since the building of The Crescent two more suburban theaters have gone up, and more are projected. Decatur now has eight moving picture theaters; the Empress shows pictures between vaudeville acts, and the Power's Opera House shows pictures on dark nights. A remarkable congeniality exists between Decatur exhibitors; a manager can borrow anything, from a carbon to a compensarc. And now a word in regard to slides. By cutting ¼ inch off the long way of a postal card photoplate (Hammer preferred), 25 cents a dozen, an excellent slide can be made by cutting through the emulsion with a phonograph needle mounted in a stick. These slides do not need a cover glass, and for durability cannot be excelled. The clean cut white letters against a black background are very pleasing. In closing let me say that my sincere wish is that the Projection Department may live long and prosper.

I am indeed surprised that you have told me about Mr. Smith, when you know that I am opposed to "kid" operators. A man ought to be old enough to have acquired some discretion and mental poise before he is placed in charge of an operating room. Joking aside, however, my compliments to Col. Smith. I would like to have his photograph, standing or seated beside his machine, if it can be managed, for publication of course. As to the slide scheme, it has been described in the department before, but quite a while ago. Personally, I think the gelatine slide is, everything taken into consideration, best. The outfit put up by the Utility Transparency Company is a very practical one for making slides for temporary announcements of various kinds.

New Reel.

Mr. H. J. Troxell, of Pennsylvania, writes as follows:

I want to ask your opinion of a moving picture reel, patent for which is pending, description of which you will find below. I started out as an operator and I know the many difficulties which confront them. I believe I have constructed a reel which will benefit both operator and manager. First, on the reel of today the film-catch on the hub of the reel is usually more or less loose. It is very hard to catch the film under the spring, working, as one must, through the holes in the side of the reel. My reel has a piece of tape fastened to the hub which extends to the outer sides of the steel discs, with the film-catch placed on the tape on the outside of the discs. This makes it easier to thread up and, at the same time, if the film lead is short, as it often is, it will lengthen it about a foot, so that the title of the reel can be shown. Second, the sides of the reel are solid, as the holes in the side are not needed, the reel itself becomes a shipping case merely by placing a casing around its circumference instead of placing the reel in a tin box as the express rules require. But sometimes my reels come three in one tin box. In my case each reel must have its own casing, and the paper or rubber band, which is placed around the reel to keep the film from rewinding, is not needed, as the casing will hold the film in place, and there will be no paper or rubber bands tearing or slipping down on the hub and making it necessary to rewind the entire reel. Third, if we receive a single reel from Philadelphia by express, the charges will be 35 cents and for our regular three reels 55 to 65 cents. Now with my reel and casing, the reel will not have to be placed in the tin box when shipping, and can be shipped by parcel post for about half the cost, as one reel could be sent for 35 cents, making a saving of about 20 per cent., or $60.00 a year, which I believe would be a consideration.

If your invention can really be made to serve as a combination reel and shipping parcel, and the postal authorities would receive the films according to your statement, why certainly it might be a great thing, but I regret to say that I am obliged to move over into Missouri on this proposition. You demonstrate to this department that you have the proposition you claim to have, and we certainly will give it our unqualified approval; but in this case we would have to have something more than a picture in proof. In fact, we would not only have to see the device itself, but would be compelled to demand a look at the documentary evidence that it is approved by the Postal Department or the Interstate Commerce Commission for the shipment of films, or at least by one of them. Personally I do not believe the postal authorities will allow films in the mails. Now, my dear sir, this is not a knock, but just a plain statement of what I would be obliged to demand in a case of this kind before I could give your device the approval of the Projection Department. I hope you have "the goods." If you have, proceed to demonstrate that fact.

Shutter Blade Matters.

H. A. Carver, Moundsville, W. Va., writes:

With regard to the matter of which James Solar complains, December 20 issue, the same being the short focal length lens and outside shutter; I had the same trouble, and this is the way I remedied it. I am using a Motiograph with number four projecting lens. The words in titles streaked both ways. I was using a three-wing shutter and 56 amperes of 110 volt, 60 cycle current. I removed the three-wing shutter and made a two-winger, but I made the main blade one-fourth inch wider than the one on the Motiograph shutter, and made the interruption blade exactly the same size as the main blade on the Motiograph shutter. This did away with the streaking and gives a flickerless picture when running about fifteen minutes to the reel. I am also using an Urban-Smith Kinemacolor machine, and am running black and white pictures five days a week, and Kinemacolor the sixth. Was troubled with too much interruption through the shutter and flicker blade, so I removed the flicker blade and perforated it, and it has improved the light 20 per cent. Am using 60 amperes on it through a choke coil, and the picture is great, but of course I have to be very careful not to cross the alternations with it. I hope this will help out some other operator. As to the rays spreading on lenses of less than 4½ e. f., why all I have to say is, let one of them get up against one of those lenses, and they will say: "Oh gee, I guess we still have something to learn."

The brother was reasonably careless with his writing and I don't know if I got all that doped out quite right. As I understand the matter, however, he evidenced a very complete knowledge of the functions of a shutter when he removed the trouble on his Motiograph. He did it in exactly the right way too. Brother Carver knows what a shutter is for and how it acts and that is more than a great many operators know, when it comes right down to brass tacks. I am not familiar with the Urban-Smith Kinemacolor machine, but I presume what friend Carver did was the right thing. I suppose what he means by being careful not to "cross the alternations" is that he must so regulate his speed that his shutter blades won't synchronize with the alternations of the current. Come again, brother, but be a little more careful with that pen scratching of yours.

Who Wants Him?

I have the name of an operator whom I have every reason to believe is a really high class man. He belongs to the I. A. T. S. E., is willing to start on a reasonable salary, say $25 per week, and demonstrate his ability. If the manager decides later he is worth more money to the house, all right.

I would not publish this except that I have very good evidence that this man is a thorough electrician, and, while I have not personally seen his work, I believe he is a man who will produce high class results. If that is true then he is worth from $25 to $30 to any high class theater. His address will be supplied upon request.

Now five or six hundred operators need not immediately get busy writing the editor, asking him to do the same for them, because he won't. This, I believe, is an exceptional case, and for that reason I am taking an exceptional action.

The Right Spirit.

A. B. Arnett, Midway, Ky., sends in 25 cents for the questions and says:

It is understood that should you not receive enough applications for the questions to justify the expense you will return the remittance. I will, however, ask that you take your time in this matter, for I feel sure that you will eventually secure enough, and I do not care to miss a good thing by being impatient.

A sufficient number of applications has been received, brother Arnett, but it may possibly be as much as a month from this date before I begin sending out the questions. You show the right spirit and good sense in not demanding an immediate return, which would not, in any event, be possible. You will receive the questions in due time.

Bad Conditions.

Janesville, Wis., sends 25 cents for a copy of the questions and says:

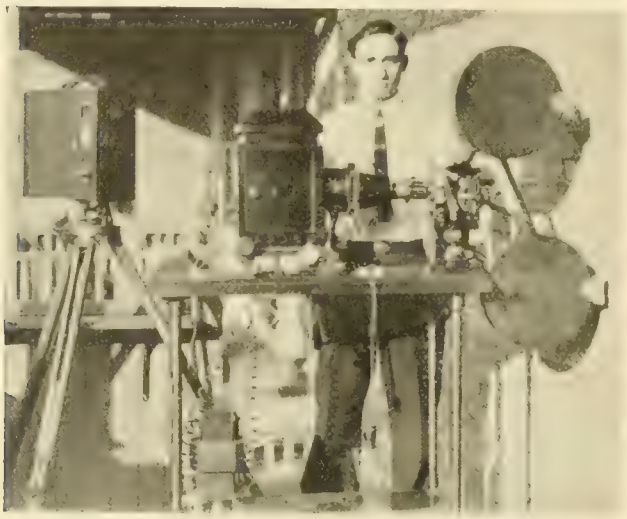
I have benefited many times through the department, and it has my highest praise. Am operating at the Apollo Theater, the only house here running first class vaudeville. I get a fairly good picture under somewhat trying conditions, due to the building of the operating room a great deal off center—in fact about ten feet to the left. I feel sometimes as if I would like to have the man who made the plans for the house by the neck while I argue with him, and secure a promise that he will never attempt to plan another operating room location.

It is to your credit, brother Breuning, that you get "fairly good results" under such conditions. Possibly if the matter be properly laid before your manager he might have the operating room moved, even though at some expense. In the long run it would pay him to do it, unless for some structural reason it is impossible.

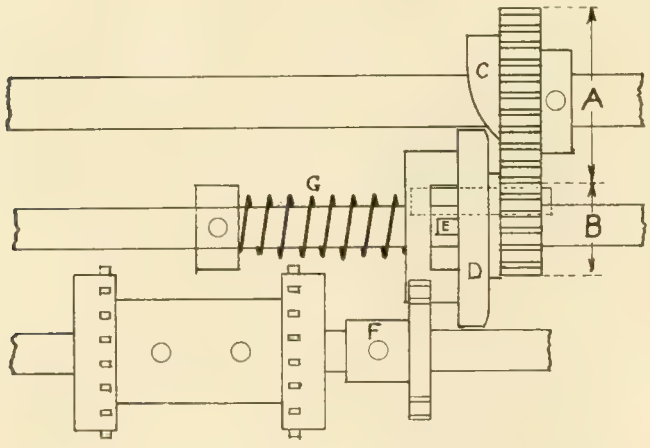
From Chicago.

O. Katzenberger, Chicago, Ill., contributes the following:

Enclosed find a photograph of a moving picture projector and camera, which I designed and built myself, although I am not an operator. I am sending you this letter in the hope that it may help some of the boys. I am a reader of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, and a close observer of technical practice. In the issue of November 22, I noticed an article based on a new take-up device that will remove all unnecessary strain on the film. Now, I do not like to discourage anyone who tries to improve anything, but about three years ago I made precisely the same device for the take-up reel in my camera. I found that it did not work any better than the old method, for this reason; it requires power to raise the arm which shifts the friction roller that rides on the round disc when the friction roller is traveling on the largest surface of the disc, so there must be a side strain on the bearings. If this were not the case the manufacturer of these machines would have used them long ago.



Now I had another idea which is applied to the projector you see in the picture. It is a device which will move the film faster and causes it to stop longer in front of the aperture, with the result that I could use a shutter with narrower wings and thus utilize a greater per cent. of the light. I found that it worked splendidly, but was too hard on the sprocket holes of the film, therefore side-tracked it.



The appended sketch will show how the apparatus works, and it may be of assistance to some operators or mechanics. Shaft B makes two revolutions to every one of shaft A. At every alternate revolution of shaft B cam C will move cam D so as to interlock pin E with star wheel F and trip it at high speed. At every other revolution of shaft B cam C will release cam D and spring G will move cam D back to its place so that pin E will pass without tripping the star wheel.

We are obliged to you, brother Katzenberger, for your contribution to the department. The projector and camera seem to be from a mechanical standpoint a very creditable piece of work. As to increasing the speed of the film in the way you mention, I could have told you that would not have worked. There are several methods of performing that particular stunt, but the trouble is a movement of about five or six to one is as much as the sprocket holes will stand up under. I could publish literally hundreds of schemes of this kind which have been tried out by machine manufacturers, but they all have been discarded, due to the weakness of the film itself. If it were possible to incorporate into the film a very thin metal strip, so as to bring the strain on the edge of the metal and allow of the increasing of the speed of the film movement it would be a great thing, but such a thing probably will never be successfully done.

Projection By Reflection.

L. A. Young, Norwich, Conn., arises to make the following speech:

Enclosed find $2.50 for another copy of the Handbook. I am ordering this, not because I want to read it, far be it from such, as this is the third one I have ordered, and I believe I know it all by heart, but because I have simply got to have it around the place. The other two I have had, I have presented to my assistants, so that now I am "Handbookless" unless you heed this S. O. S. and rush one poco pronto, Quieh Sabe Senor? (Mexican stuff is all the rage now. Can't grab the "poco" part, but I'm wise to the rest.—Ed.). As regard the questions, why go to it, old scout, and more power to you. And now this is where I slap you on the wrist. Regarding your arguments against projection by reflection, I think you have just a trace of stubbornness and refuse to be convinced as to the practicability of the thing. I know very well that in your position you cannot afford to boost an article you know nothing about, but, on the other hand, you should remain open to conviction. I say that projection by reflection is possible, also practical, and I have seen the proposition demonstrated.

While the device for producing this kind of projection is not perfect, neither is there any perfect machine on the market of the other type, as you very well know. But I am sure of this much: If you were taken into a room where the two types of projectors were in operation at one and the same time, and if you were to judge solely by the results on the screen, it's dollars to the proverbial doughnut that you would, without hesitation, select the optical projector as the best. Now I am not trying to boost any particular device, neither am I looking for an argument, but I thought I would take a slam at you just to keep you from getting too chesty, since if all the boys boost you continually you will need a little dig once in a while. I could start lots of arguments, but what's the use I will save them, so beware! I'm keeping my eye on you and if you show any signs of exaggerated ego, I will let the axe drop. Regarding the question as to whether a mercury tube can be worked with a compensarc, it would cost more than the original rectifier, and the result would not be satisfactory.

Well, I've spoke my little piece for the present, so I will now retire gracefully to the rear and be seated. With best wishes for your future success. P. S. I've got a "Red Indian 7" that can knock the spots off of your "Harley-D."

Plainly, brother Young is no enemy to the Handbook. Now look here, you, Mr. Young man, I'm going to land on you. I'm not stubborn, except insofar as I have to be to protect those who look to this department for guidance, and that—not bragging, but as a statement of fact—is a goodly number of operators, managers and exhibitors. If a paper of small circulation and small influence rashly gives approval to a project which may or may not prove successful, no great harm is done, but a paper of large circulation and real influence cannot afford to give its sanction and approval lightly.

Thousands depend, at least to a considerable extent, upon this department for advice and guidance in certain matters, to wit: things pertaining to projection. Why is this? The answer is simple. The editor of this department himself created the department and has, so far, steered its course. He has consistently, first, last and all the time absolutely refused to set the seal of his approval, which is the approval of the department, upon anything whatever, utterly regardless of who owned it, or whether they were or were not advertisers in the paper, until he had first personally examined the device and had it demonstrated to his entire satisfaction that he could conscientiously recommend it. This course has at times been a difficult one to follow, but it has been followed and the result is that our readers know that when the Projection Department says "this is good," it is good. Now projection by reflection is a practical thing experimentally, but I very much doubt, for reasons I have already set forth in the department, that it is pratical on a commercial scale. If it is let its promoters who talk much, but demonstrate considerably less, show me that fact and the moment they do that you will find that I am anything else but stubborn. But until they do do this I'm carrying a banner inscribed, "Show me" and, frankly, I don't believe they can do it, and this belief is based on my knowledge of what such a projector has to do and how it must do it.

As to that "Red Indian 7," it pains me deeply to be obliged to inform you that that Harley-D of mine can climb a telegraph pole, set on an insulator and sing "God Save the King" to the tune of "Marching Through Georgia," whereas an Indian can only grunt, "Huh!"

It Flickers.

White River Junction, Vermont, is wound up in a ball of trouble as follows:

I am a New York licensed operator and have been running a machine for about four years, but one thing puzzles me, viz: why does my picture flicker? Some days it seems to run without a flicker and other days flickers a great deal. The current is 110 volt a. c. My shutter is perfect in every way. The machine is a Power's Six A.

Your trouble may be very simple, and may not be. However, the first solution which suggests itself is this: some days you may have light films and other days your films may chance to be quite dense. A flicker which would not be noticeable in a dense film might, and probably would, show up very badly in a light film. Another solution might be that on some days you are feeling right strong and chipper and make the wheels go round faster, which would tend to eliminate the flicker, since the higher the speed the less the flicker, whereas on other days perhaps you have had your best girl out to a dance until the wee sma' hours and, in consequence, you have that tired feeling, so that the aforesaid wheels revolve with less rapidity. In other words, maybe some days you run your machine faster than others. It is hard to give you any definite information, but it is a cinch if the conditions are the same all the time, the flicker will be the same. Your being a "New York licensed operator" doesn't prove much of anything, my dear sir. There are quite some "operators" who have received license by the New York Examining Board who could not project a decent picture to save their souls.

Power's Six Trouble.

Stratford, Ont., Canada, writes:

> Am running a Power's Six machine and would like to know how I can stop the toggle gear from grinding. It makes a grinding noise when the framing lever is up about one inch. When the lever is clear up or clear down it runs quiet. How can I remedy this trouble. Also when the film starts to go down over the aperture plate, that is, just at the bottom of the top loop, it makes quite a clatter at times, usually when a title is going through. What is the cause of this?

With regard to the toggle gear, in the first place be sure that connecting link, 682, Figure 121, page 284 of your handbook is tight in its ways. If it is not, then, first having loosened screws 745, Figure 121, slightly tighten set screws 744 (in behind the cog wheel) just a very little, and re-tighten screw 745. Now try your framing lever, and if it works too hard you have got it a little too tight and will have to slack off a trifle. Make the adjustment so the framing lever will work just about right when wing-nut, 652, Figure 119, is slacked clear off. This puts your toggle gear where it ought to be. Now if the grinding still remains it is probably because the toggle gear is too tight, either against the flywheel pinion or the other (large) gear. Place the framing lever central and then set a broad faced steel punch against the large guide casting, 684, Figure 121, and strike it a sharp blow, but not too hard. Now try your machine and if the matter is worse than it was before, then the toggle gear was meshing to tightly against the driving gear and you will have to reverse your action, driving the casting the other way, the idea being to center the toggle gear between the flywheel pinion and the large gear on the other side. It is not necessary to remove the flywheel to do this. I think if you follow out those instructions carefully, applying common sense thereto, you will probably remedy, or at least help your trouble. As to the film, I don't know what to say about that, considering the way you have put it. I think you had better make sure that your top gate rollers are not too close together, or rather that spring 729, Figure 116, of the Handbook is not exerting too much pressure. You might also try bending the gate idlers in closer to the aperture plate, or further out. You cannot do any damage by so doing, because if it does not improve matters you can simply bend them back to the original position, using a pair of pliers for the bending. Be careful, however, that you don't bend the whole gate, but just the upper part carrying the rollers.

Right and Wrong.

Albany, N. Y., sends in the following relative to our recent puzzle, "Answer This, If You Can?"

> I do not pretend to be a wise one. I am in this game to learn, not to teach, but nevertheless I have a think on this particular proposition, and my thought is that in the first place the glass in the condenser partially screens out the heat-light rays which affect glass, converting them into heat, so that when our second glass medium is introduced into the rays at the machine aperture, very few rays are left that cannot pass through the glass without heating it. Secondly, the conductivity of metal and other radiation helps to rapidly dissipate what heat is generated.

You are correct, I think, Albany, so far as the reason for the glass at the aperture not heating is concerned, but you are wrong if you mean that the metal at the aperture would help dissipate what heat was generated, since though the glass is cool or cold and the metal very hot, the action would be the reverse. Possibly, however, I misunderstood you in that.

Condenser Holder.

W. Crowther, Fall River, Mass., sends in 25 cents for the list of questions and makes certain remarks about his condenser mount as follows:

> I have made myself a pair of condenser lens holders of heavy brass which will take some time to cool off, thus keeping the outer edge of Mr. Lens hot while its center is slowly cooling down. This has, in my case, prevented breakage up to date. Will send one along for examination if you think it would be of any value to anyone.

This device is evidently precisely the same thing evolved by brother Woods, of San Francisco, which he showed me while I was in that city. I think I described the device in the department at that time. It is, in my judgment, an excellent scheme, and one which might very well be adopted by machine manufacturers. I would not like to say that it would eliminate condenser breakage, but it certainly would very largely reduce it. Brother Woods' holder was about one-half inch thick, as I remember it.

The Matter of Throw.

New York City makes the following inquiry:

> Am operating in a place where I have a 50-foot throw, with 25 amperes at the arc, and am getting almost a perfect picture. Now suppose that I moved the machine back so as to make a 100-foot throw. I would, of course, have to get new condensers and a new objective lens, but the question I wish to ask is: could I still use 25 amperes and get the same light density on the screen as when I had the 50-foot throw?

Assuming your picture to be of the same size and the lens of equally good quality, there would not be much difference, but there would be a little, due to the fact that there is a somewhat greater loss between the film and objective lens where a long focal length objective is used than where a short one is used. After the light has left the objective lens there is practically no difference between 50 and 100 feet. But you are using too low an amperage; I would boost it up to 30 at least, and 35 would be much better. If you increase the size of your picture you will also have to increase your amperage to get the same results, regardless whether you increase the throw or not.

Made His Own Camera.

Elmer Stites, Shelbyville, Ind., encloses an interesting picture and writes:

> Please find enclosed money order for Handbook. I am sending a picture of myself, and the moving picture camera which I constructed myself. It has a capacity of 250 feet. The movement is of the claw type; I also made this myself. Projection in Shelbyville is excellent. There are two theaters here, one running pictures and vaudeville, and the other, The Alhambra, owned by Mr. Rembusch, inventor of the mirror screen, running pictures only. I have not seen anything from our city in the department, but maybe the boys have no troubles. A new theater is about ready to start up, and will use Power's Six A equipment. Do you think a new intermittent movement would be worth patenting? The sprocket and the cam shaft would move in the same direction. Are manufacturers usually reluctant to take outside ideas? I hope you will excuse this writing, for twisting a crank is easier to me than handling a pen. Please autograph the Handbook, which I hope I will find as interesting as the department always is.

Either this young gentleman is older than he looks, or this letter is a remarkable one. It is better written and better composed than nine out of ten the editor receives, and it talks good, plain sense all the way through. That a boy in knee pants should construct such a camera as the one illustrated seems to be, is something more than remarkable. Friend Stites must be something in the nature of a mechanical genius. As to the question concerning the patent, I could not reply without first having examined the movement and studied its peculiarities. Manufacturers usually will accept an idea that has real value, but you first must thoroughly demonstrate to them that it is of real value, that it is a practical device from the constructional point of view, and that it won't require too radical a change in their present machinery, jigs, dies, tools, etc.

As to autographing the Handbook, I get a great many requests of that kind, but usually the book has gone forward before I even see the letter. It would entail a whole lot of trouble to autograph individual books, and would, for this reason, be hardly practical.

Many Thanks.

The editor desires to thank the senders of the flood of Christmas cards, etc., which came to him at the Yuletide period. Also he wishes to express his appreciation of those who sent little remembrances of one kind and another, all of which are appreciated, not so much on account of the gift or the card as for the friendly spirit and kindly thought these things evidenced.

I take this method of thanking you all, as it would be almost impossible to do so by a personal letter, or even by card.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

"THE STOLEN HEART" (Selig), December 30.—Human fun depends on things that are really human. Certain situations may be savage or barbarous (more or less elemental) and still be human. They will amuse; for in every one of us there is still some of the bygone past. In this picture we find a situation that has more that repels than appeals. It is aimed at the fin-de-siecle consciousness and at the same time outrages it—the author, Ralph Delmore, missed his mark when he offered that bedroom scene as comedy. The picture has a very charming leading actress whose playing nearly saved the scene and the photography is beautiful. To the players and the producer all the credit for this picture's good things are due. It has some lovely scenes.

"WHEN LOVE IS YOUNG" (Essanay), December 31.—Natural embarrassment of youngsters before the camera goes a good way to match the real acting of their elders in making this idyllic comedy pleasing. Three of the chief players are in the very early teens and enact a love story—conventional it would have been for older people—in comedy vein. It is a success, although better photography would have helped. You can't see the faces in some of the scenes. The backgrounds are rural, but seem a bit cramped.

"BY THE TWO OAK TREES" (Patheplay), December 31.—An elemental story of the West. The players (George Gebhart, Madeline West, Red Wing) are about as skillful as any we know for this sort of thing and, although the situation is not really dramatic, get as much as is possible out of it.

"ANDY GETS A JOB" (Edison), December 31.—The good quality of the playing on the part of Andy Clark, who is an appealing little comedian, and of Jessie Stevens, as the washerwoman, his mother, make the early scenes of this offering delightfully human and convincing. As the story progresses and Andy goes out to look for a job to keep his mother from being dispossessed, it drops into some very trite situations and loses by them. The author, Alice Williams, could have done better with this material. Charles H. France, the producer, has handled those kitchen scenes well; but both author and producer were hampered by the thousand feet requirement.

"THE EDUCATION OF AUNT GEORGIANA" (Vitagraph), December 31.—Here was a situation fit for a little masterpiece and would have been one, if the author, W. A. Tremayne, had taken time to make it convincing. The players (Kate Price, Mary Charleson, Maurice Costello) have caught the right spirit; but by suggesting the possibilities serve to keep us reminded that the script is hack work and not, as a whole, inspired by imagination. There are plenty of good things in it; for as we have said, the players are very amusing and the author also shows that he knows his business. It is good; but it might have been much better. The production was under the care of Maurice Costello and of Robert Gaillord. Backgrounds, sets and photography are all that one could desire.

"FATHER'S DAY" (Selig), December 31.—It is seldom that we find the production spoiling the script, but it seems to have in this case. The idea here and also the story are fine, but the players, excellent workers in many roles, were most unfortunately chosen for these. The son, played by William Stowell, is full of counter suggestions. It repels us to see a man with his character of physiognomy acting as this son acts. Then Hilda (Adele Lane) put comedy into her part, a quality that should have been as far removed from it as the poles. The story by Gilson Willetts should have been as impressive as a Bible parable. That giving away of the fruit, taking the old man to a show, giving him many cigars (all these things probably the author's carelessness) really outraged the old man in his sorrow. In truth, it is heart-breaking to see the possibilities going to waste here. One can't call this a good offering.

"A MOTORCYCLE ELOPEMENT" (Biograph), January 1.—A finely photographed bit of comedy in which figures a motorcycle the trade name of which is somewhat conspicuous.

"SKELLEY'S SKELETON" (Biograph), January 1.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this comedy, which will make a lot more than the ordinary amount of amusement. Mr. Murray is the funmaker in chief, and he is ably assisted by the portrayer of Dr. Drugs, who buys his skeleton. It is real farce-comedy—as good as the best.

"TEMPLES OF JAPAN" (Melies), January 1.—A whole reel is here given over to showing different temples. There is much of interest in the picture, but the reviewer would have enjoyed it more had it been cut in two. It is an unusual scenic of travelogue that can hold up attention for a thousand feet.

"THROUGH TRACKLESS SANDS" (Essanay), January 1.—In the opening scenes of this picture there is a good and near thrilling rescue of a child that has fallen over a cliff. Later on there is a series of views of a sure-enough desert that will interest. The story may be described as an average Westerner. It is of a ranchman who tries to win another man's wife by sending the husband on a false errand out on a desert, and when later he learns that the man he has sent to destruction has previously saved the life of his little daughter he relents and goes out and rescues the traveler.

"THE SECRET OF THE BULB" (Vitagraph), January 1.—A child takes a ring from a tray and loses it in a pot where a bulb has just been planted. The nurse, in love with the son of the household, is accused by her mistress of theft and discharged. She goes without visible protest, an altogether unnatural attitude. Later, when the plant emerges to the surface, the ring is found. When the son goes to a detective agency for assistance in finding the nurse he is accidentally shot. Of course, it is forcing a situation to bring about the discovery of the nurse, where the natural mode of procedure would have been in looking for a nurse to inquire at the hospitals.

"GOOD RESOLUTIONS" (Selig), January 1.—William Duncan writes and produces this story. Also he plays the role of Captain Ellsmere, a former British officer fallen on evil days. It will cause wonder on the part of some why the mine owner, when he believed his daughter to be imprisoned in a burning mine, did not himself go to her rescue instead of appealing to an employee. The story is well acted. Especially worthy of praise is Florence Dye, in the role of a waitress. Myrtle Stedman as the mine owner's daughter is wholesome, convincing. There is a distinct literary flavor to the letter sent by the waitress to the captain telling him she is already married. Effective also is the last scene taken on the rear platform of an observation car. These two bits constitute real punches.

"MISADVENTURES OF A MIGHTY MONARCH" (Vitagraph), January 2.—This reel is reminiscent of the Mardi Gras at Coney Island at the close of the season in September. A tale of domestic trouble has been woven around the scenes of the festivities; it is a story of wife Flora's jealousy—unfounded, be it understood—of Queen Lillian. Husband King John, on one of the mornings after, still all fussed up as he was the day and evening before, is shut out of his home and falls afoul of Tramp Bill Shea, who with the aid of an enormous pistol robs the king of his robes. The king gets the pistol with the cast-off attire, but when he examines it more closely discovers and withdraws a fan from the innocent if murderous looking muzzle. All interested parties meet later in the station house, where matters are straightened out. A good release.

"BILL'S BOARD BILL" (Kalem), January 2.—Ruth Roland makes a corking boarding house mistress and shows how a wife doing this sort of work is entitled to "put it over" on her husband. John Brennan is the boarder. There are some good laughs in the picture.

"CAMBRIDGESHIRE RACE MEET" (Kalem), January 2.—On the same reel as the foregoing are these topical views in Great Britain and one in Paris. We see pictures of the damage done by a real cyclone in a Welsh town.

"A CORNER IN POPULARITY" (Lubin), January 2.—Rather slight seashore comedy.

"THE MISSING DIAMOND" (Lubin), January 2.—This is a Jewish burlesque on the same reel as the foregoing, which starts rather slow, but which makes considerable fun toward the end.

"THE ABANDONED WELL" (Biograph), January 3.—A none too original story of a foster father who hides his wealth at the bottom of an abandoned well. The son, going into the well to steal the money, finds the little girl has fallen inside. He overcomes his desire for the money and takes the child home. His foster father then gives him money on which to marry. Well pictured, but not very strong as to plot.

"STANTON'S LAST FLING" (Edison), January 3.—This film story, from "The Interlude," by H. B. Marriott Watson, develops well. It carries the atmosphere of the continent convincingly. The hero succeeds in rescuing Lady Angela from the Chevalier, who is a fortune hunter and kidnapper combined. Charles Vernon, Miriam Nesbitt and William Leonard have the leads and present the rather difficult scenes convincingly. The photography is smooth and pleasing.

"A DREAM OF THE WILD" (Kalem), January 3.—The dream into which Tom falls after reading some Indian stories takes him into the midst of a series of Western adventures. The Indian girl, played by Mona Darkfeather, assists him after his injuries, and when the time comes for parting both regret it very much. Nothing exceptionally new in this, but some agreeable scenes and pleasing photography help the interest along.

"THE CIRCLE'S END" (Lubin), January 3.—A desert story which holds the interest successfully. Romaine Fielding and Mary Ryan appear. The plot is a little slow in developing, but gets hold after a time and is aided by some unique camera work. The love story is a pretty one; the acting intense and the photography strikingly vivid.

"THE REDEMPTION OF BRONCHO BILLY" (Essanay), January 3.—This reel follows rather too closely in the manner of its numerous predecessors, so far as plot is concerned. Broncho Billy has the usual struggle between right and wrong, but comes out victorious in the end. In settings and general motive the story is good, but it lacks action and fresh situations.

"HER BOY" (Lubin), December 29.—The story of a gambler and his son with a situation very much like one in a very recent picture by Lubin, called "A Son of His Father," but by a different author. It is a stock situation, but Wilbert Melville, author and producer of this picture, has gained what may be called a commercial freshness by the new grouping of his stock properties. The players do fairly and it is fairly interesting. It is very hard to find anything special to say about such an offering.

"HER FACE WAS HER FORTUNE" (Edison), December 29.—The object of this picture is to tell a joke elaborately. There is too little action in it for the film used and, though all the scenes are artistic pictures, and though there is fair acting for this farcical sort of story, it drags in places. The author, Mark Swan, doesn't deserve great credit. C. J. Williams produced it.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY, No. 80."—There is no item of special importance this week; but all are of fair interest.

"HER HUSBAND'S FRIEND" (Vitagraph), December 29.—The story of the pretty girl with a drunken husband and of the husband's friend who loves her. Myrtle Gonzales, both by her acting and by her personality, provides the quality necessary to win sympathy. The author, W. A. Tremayne, has not thought it necessary to work up to the happy ending logically. He has developed the high points and skillfully left it emotionally convincing without the logic. Hardee Kirkland produced it.

"THE MYSTERY OF THE DOVER EXPRESS" (Edison), December 30.—A mystery story in which a very clever detective outwits a diamond thief, but not until he has killed the diamond merchant's messenger and also the conductor on the train. The picture's special cleverness lies in the fact that the spectator is deceived as well as the police by the expedient of using a disguise. This is to help the messenger get to his destination without being known to the thieves. The crook kills him in a park, takes the disguise and passes as the messenger. Then when he has killed the conductor he dresses himself between scenes in the same disguise and again we are deceived. Thomas Hanshew is the author of the script and George Lessey is the producer.

"THE GHOST OF SELF" (Essanay), December 30.—It is hard to believe that a cruel man would be likely to see a ghost of himself and be cured of his hardness by it. The trouble with the story of this offering is that there is very little in it that is believable. It is well acted; but makes no strong appeal. Take one instance, there is one face among those who came to stand behind the ghost, wraiths of those men and women he had ground down, and that one face is so pugnacious and so capable of taking care of himself that the whole scene is spoiled.

"BEFORE THE LAST LEAVES FALL" (Lubin), December 30.—A freshly pleasing story suggested, it seems certain, by one of picturedom's semi-classics of the same name and especially interesting, if so, through its showing how a truly wideawake photoplay writer can utilize suggestions in other pictures and get freshness by giving an entirely different meaning to any action simply by the addition or subtraction of human motives. We commend Emmett Campbell Hall's work in this picture wholly. It is a quite new story and has a touch of the sentimentality that goes well with the majority. Edgar Jones has produced it in scenes full of pleasing suggestions and pictorial charm. There is a thunderstorm that we take pleasure in claiming as the best any producer has yet done. Maybe he took these bedroom scenes during a real lightning storm; they look so.

"HIS SECOND WIFE" (Vitagraph), December 30.—Not a very pleasant story and produced in a rather unconvincing way, especially as to small things. The weakest part of it is the suburban atmosphere in the backgrounds which should have been woody. There is a well suggested snowstorm among forest trees and a perfect night scene looking toward a lighted window. The interiors are excellent. But, going back to the story, the willingness of the man to marry the school teacher after she has weakly let him entice her to his hunting lodge where the storm makes them stay all night, fails to get over strongly. Eliza Harrel is the author and Ralph Ince produced it.

"THE SNEAKTHIEF" (Patheplay), December 30.—A pet dog's propensity for taking things—jewelry, corsets—anything he finds lying around gets a youth, staying at the hotel, accused of theft. There is a love story, of course. The picture is made in good comedy spirit, and though very slight is acceptable entertainment. It was taken at a big hotel near the beach.

"THE MYSTERY OF THE MILK" (Biograph), January 5.—A gather and chase farce which has some laughable situations. It amused the audience.

"THE JANITOR'S REVENGE" (Biograph), January 5.—Janitor is keeping warm while tending the furnace, an oil stove beside him. There is a knockabout farce going on upstairs. There are some witty things in it and it made a reasonable amount of laughter.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 2," January 5.—Admiral Dewey's portrait is given and receives the warmest greeting everywhere. A royal-ecclesiastic Russian ceremony with the Czar and his family, then other items make a very fair number.

"THE STORY THE GATE TOLD" (Lubin), January 5.—An old Colonial legend made into a motion picture. It furnishes some very pretty scenes, but was not effectively written as a story. There is nothing brilliant in the acting and no sense of finality in the costuming. One accident, carelessly left in, will kill the offering for any audience. It happens when one of the players is alighting from her horse. One of these incidents that would pass among cultivated people unnoticed, where we saw it, it brought out such a comment from some fool down in the pit that the manager had to put him out to save his face.

"FRANCINE" (Vitagraph), January 5.—There is much true humanity behind the action of this picture, written by M. L. Goetchins, but it makes one feel that a great deal of it fails to get over. The acting is always pleasant to look at and at times shows skill, but it is not wholly effective in convincing us that the players are what they want to seem. The failure of the picture is not at the door of the players. The producer, Ulysses Davis, has filled every requirement up to the point where the bare statement of fact fails to carry all the spirit the story needs, but from that point he is not sure enough. The story is, or ought to be, full of subtile sentiment and is probably a case where two reels were needed to make a strong development. The lovers from France and simple souls do not understand the atmosphere of American life, but try to conform. An up-to-date boarding house girl makes mischief and then they fly away to France and happiness.

"THE GIRL IN THE MIDDY" (Edison), January 5.—A pretty little comedy, slight but amusing. Its charm is mostly due to the acting of Mabel Trunnelle who, as a young woman of twenty-two, makes a romance for herself by a prank, dressing in the clothes of her little sister and pretending that she is only thirteen—we may add that the pretense gets over. She has an adventure, meets a man who takes her for a child and later meets him unexpectedly while helping her mother entertain. It is a commendable piece of picture work, was written by Mark Swan and produced by C. Jay Williams.

"THE UNWELCOME THRONE" (Selig), December 29.—An offering in three reels of which to-day but two are presented. It was a compliment to the picture as entertainment that we heard at its close from a woman, viz.: "Well, I don't like that." The woman was interested enough in it to dislike being left in the air, as it were, with the story unfinished. In fact, it is the only story of multiple reel quality among the special offerings to-day. That wild animals are used in it does not harm it; because the story is never made (so far) to depend upon them. Its best quality comes from the story's frankly romantic and adventurous spirit, which offers a good escape from the realities of life in making an American girl inherit under compulsion a throne in India. The rest of it was still to come. The costumes are rich and appropriate. One or two scenes from the actual Orient are introduced and help a good deal. The acting is fair, Kathlyn Williams has the leading role, with Lafayette McKee as her father; Charles Clary as the Indian prince who conspires to force her to take the throne and then to marry him; and with Miss Sackville as the girl's sister. The script was written by Gilson Willets and F. J. Grandon produced it at the Selig Zoo in Los Angeles.

"A MODERN JEKYLL AND HYDE" (Kalem), December 29.—A two-reel offering that makes no pretense of living up to its title, for it is frankly melodramatic and in no sense a psychological study. The father of a pretty girl is a crook and burglar; but he has never let her suspect it and he dies (killed by one of his own gang) in the odor of respectability. The girl and her sweetheart never know the truth. This story is too slight to be very effective, especially with two reels of film. The picture has some pretty backgrounds and good sets; is fairly acted and has excellent photography throughout. The producer's work was good; all of the scenes were handled to get the best out of the material. Robert Broderick plays the crook; Irene Boyle, his daughter, and Robert Ellis, her sweetheart. William R. Dunn plays the one of the crook's gang who is obstreperous and who kills him in a pistol fight alone in a darkened room—the flashes showing when a gun is fired.

"THE WEDDING GOWN" (Biograph), December 29.—A good love story not too sentimental, but with a touch of sugaring now and then, especially in the poses of its leading player, Gertrude Robinson. Her acting is more in her early manner than in the manner of her best work. We feel sure that her producer sacrificed what was better in this picture for what was merely sweet. It is the story of a country girl engaged to a young farmer. She has a taste of the broader life in the city and comes near marrying a city man. There is much in the scenes that is not of vital importance to getting the story over to us and this makes it drag; but the scenes, taken separately, seem natural and truthful. The story holds; but not with the dramatic vigor that it might have had if told in one reel. Some of the players picture real characters; but even in them there is nothing forceful in the picture.

"WHEN A WOMAN WILLS" (Cines), December 30.—A two-part offering that we have noticed at length in another issue—see page 1258 of December 13, 1913.

"WHEN STRONG WILLS CLASH" (Patheplay), January 1.—The best picture of the day by far. These two reels are made in the Paris studio. They tell a human story that grips from beginning to end. The wills that clash are those of a son and a mother who has objected to the former, a painter, choosing his model for his wife. There are four principals in the cast—the son, the mother, the model and a nurse. Their work is compelling, artistic and lifelike. It is a pretty story, with a delightful ending. The whole production is most praiseworthy.

"THE INSPECTOR'S STORY" (Lubin), January 1.—Clay M. Greene is credited with the arrangement of this story from his own poem. We are bound to say that the story is much better done than was the poem. The use of the verses to indicate the action instead of depending on straight leaders is responsible for using up out of 1,700 probably 300 feet—that was one exhibitor's estimate—in titles. The best of poetry is questionable material for indicating action—that is, unless it is very short. Robert Drouet is strong and sympathetic as the inspector. Little Eleanor Dunn as the daughter of the man sent to jail does splendid work. She shows a grasp of situations that is unusual in a child. The picture is humanly acted. The pardon of the governor was granted on somewhat scant premises, on the plea of a child and the word of a police inspector. The script overlooks the fact that in New York, where the story is located, it is customary to consult the district attorney and the sentencing judge in cases of pardon. At the end of the second reel is a 300-foot industrial, "Manufacturing Pearl Buttons," which will interest.

"THE AWAKENING AT SNAKEVILLE" (Essanay), January 2.—A review of this two-part subject will be found on page 1390 in the issue of December 20.

"THE STREET SINGERS" (Vitagraph), January 3.—This two-reel number is apparently intended for serious comedy-drama, but it hovers on the edge of burlesque much of the time. It was hard to imagine Lillian Walker as the daughter of an Italian musician and more difficult to imagine Wally Van a young clubman willing to marry her under all the circumstances. Yet the scenes are well pictured and the principals throw sufficient spirit into the acting to make the production attractive, even though it lacked conviction. A New Year's celebration is a pleasing feature toward the close, and this is followed by interior views at the Vitagraph studio.

"THE RESURRECTION" (Patheplay), January 3.—A two-reel number with Irving Cummings as the hero and Mildred Oakes and Pearl Sindelar in the leading feminine roles. The artist's model induces Bruce to marry her so she can leave him her money. Later she comes to life at the undertaker's parlors. He marries again and later his second wife deserts him. He then finds happiness with the first, whom he meets at the studio. This struck us as a rather made-to-order plot, though it possesses enough novelty to hold the interest. It does not get hold of the emotions very strongly.

"A SHOT IN THE NIGHT" (Kalem), January 5.—A two-part picture giving a variant of the husband-burglar story. In this case, the husband is shot by his wife, who mistakes him for a thief. Added interest is given by a more human, but, in this picture, secondary story—made so by lack of real dramatic interest—of step-mother and step-child, a little boy who is jealous and unconciliating. These two are brought together by the tragic accident and then the husband and father gets well. There is only one serious trouble with the offering; it should have been done in one reel. The scenes, though pretty and natural enough, give little action till the second half of the second reel and fail to waken interest till that point. The acting is good, though there are moments when it doesn't quite hit.

"UNTO THE THIRD AND FOURTH GENERATION" (Selig), January 5.—A two-part offering that is more of a preachment than a drama. It is not skillfully pictured and is weak in its transitions. It jumps over a hundred years without warning or explanation—none was needed by the story, it is true, but the jump is a jolt none the less. We leave in one scene the coast of Ireland and come up against the scoreboard of a college football game. Another scene early in the picture shows an aristocratic squire's family going in to dinner and on the table are four wine glasses. Three of them are soiled with the dregs of wine and one is half full. We don't believe the squire came in early and drank what had been poured out. One heroine, a fiancée of the squire's son, points at dinner to the roast as soon as it is brought in as asking for some tit-bit to be saved for her, and this is also very unlikely among well-bred people. These would hurt any story, but this one is not strong at best. W. E. Wing is the author and Edward Le Saint the producer. There is no brilliant playing in it.

"HOW MOTION PICTURES ARE MADE" (Keystone), January 15.—This very interesting film gives a bird's-eye view of the immense plant of the Broncho, Kay-Bee and Domino moving picture companies, said to be the largest in the world. Then closer views are given of the wardrobe rooms, scenario department, truck garden, developing room, arsenal and other interesting sights connected with the manufacture of films. The reel winds up with some characteristic nonsense by the Keystone Company. A pleasing number.

"A SORORITY INITIATION" (Majestic), January 10.—Mary's father is in prison and when the girl's fraternity decrees that she shall spend a night in the haunted house it develops that she gets evidence sufficient to free him. A light offering, with a dash of excitement toward the close.

"THE LOAFER" (Reliance), January 7.—In this number George Siegman gives a pleasing bit of character work. He appears as a young loafer with pugilistic tendencies, who learns a lesson from the young doctor. The plot is rather slight, but very well handled.

"SOME ROGUES AND A GIRL" (Reliance), January 3.—This film starts out with an interesting story of the dramatic type, but later it drifts off into a mixture of comedy and burlesque. There is so much coincidence and improbability in it that the purpose of the story is not clear; it contains too much excitement to be a comedy and too much comedy to be a good drama.

"THE TALE OF A SHIRT" (Apollo), January 4.—There are some laughing moments in this burlesque comedy number. Fred Mace appears as Count Nothing and Bud is his valet. The search for the missing shirt in the Chinese laundry proves very hilarious, the humor, of course, being of the "rough house" order. The scene on the bridge was also good.

"MOLLIE AND THE OIL KING" (Majestic), January 4.—A pretty love story with Lamar Johnstone and Francelia Billington as the young couple. The girl disregards business ethics and hires out to her father's rival as stenographer. When she has obtained the information she desires she confesses and is forgiven. Not very probable or very new, but pleasingly presented.

"THE TEN OF SPADES" (Majestic), January 6.—Muriel Ostriche here appears as a young girl left alone in the world in a Western mining camp. She is trained up for the dancing halls. The scenes carry a certain convincing atmosphere and the girl's sad end, after reading her fortune in the cards, bring the story to an appropriate close. Just a sketchy bit, handled pleasingly.

"A ROMANCE OF THE RURAL ROUTE" (Princess), January 2.—The miserly uncle puts up a job on the young mail carrier, who wants to marry his niece. In the end the uncle's scheme is exposed. A light subject of about average interest.

"TOO MANY COOKS" (Powers), January 19.—Donald MacDonald produced and plays the lead in this domestic comedy which depends for its fun on the difficulties of a small family in getting a proper cook.

"THE MYSTERY OF A TAXICAB" (Joker), January 17.—Max Asher and Harry McCoy in this burlesque have departed from their usual stunt as "Mike and Jake" and appear as the chief advisers of a most wicked looking Sultan who has a harem full of very pretty girls. Bob Vernon plays the part of the Sultan. The story is very fantastical and, on the whole, the film is a pretty good burlesque.

"THE CIRCLE OF FATE" (Kay-Bee), January 16.—A story of revenge, which gives it a decidedly grim windup. The opening scenes are laid at Naples, where the villain, John Strom, lures the girl away from her father. Two years later he deserts her. The girl dies, after returning to her father, who is a mountain guide. Strom joins one of his parties, and the father, learning his identity, pushes him into the crater of a volcano. The scenic effects in this film are worthy of a more uplifting story. The flaming crater of the volcano was well suggested.

"THE OPTION" (Rex), January 18.—Edna Maison and J. Francis McDonald appear in the cast of this film story. The plot follows familiar lines, the girl stenographer holding up her employer with a revolver while she buys an option with money obtained from him. The business ethics of this offering are open to criticism. The photography and construction are good.

"MABEL'S STORMY LOVE AFFAIR" (Keystone), January 5.—An eccentric comedy offering, with Mabel Normand in the leading role. She has a world of trouble with her rival lovers. Not quite enough plot at the beginning of this to make it as successful as some offerings of the kind.

"SAVING THE CHILD" (Joker), January 14.—A farce burlesque that is astonishingly funny. Its feature is the surprises in it, very funny and plentiful as well as fresh. A desirable release, clever, clean and enjoyable.

"THE IMP ABROAD" (Victor), January 12.—This story has the unique distinction of beginning in the nether regions. From this place the devil's son pays the earth a visit and after getting a girl who is anxious for a title, and a barber, who palms himself off as a count into all kinds of trouble, he returns to his proper abiding place. The settings are interesting.

"SHE WROTE A PLAY" (Eclair), January 18.—The heroine of this burlesque, like many another playwright, wrote a play but could not get anyone to produce it. She was finally fortunate enough to get it favorably considered at an insane asylum in which she landed at the end.

"A FATHER'S DEVOTION" (Crystal), January 18.—The father, who decides to sacrifice himself for his daughter's happiness, is well characterized in this drama. As it happens, the sacrifice proves unnecessary and the whole ends satisfactorily. Pearl White and Chester Barnett play the leads.

"PERCY NEEDED A REST" (Imp), January 15.—Walter Morton produces this story of a city man in the country. It ought to make a lot of fun. There is quite a bit of "rube" business which is novel.

"TRUST BEGETS TRUST" (Powers), January 16.—This is one of Edwin August's dramas, produced by him and he plays the leading part, that of a crook named Marx, who is reformed as the result of a bet, becomes mayor of a small town and marries a very pretty girl. The play opens with a spirited chase, many of the scenes are laid in the underworld of a big city, and though the production as a whole is rather melodramatic and at times fails to convince, it will be favorably received in many show houses. Mr. August is sometimes at too great pains to achieve an effect.

"CUPID'S CLOSE SHAVE" (Nestor), January 16.—We have here a bright little comedy portraying a war between two barbers, one of them the sweetheart of a very pretty girl; and the other, the father of that girl who does not want her to marry that sweetheart. The trouble begins while the sweetheart is assistant to the father and falls in love with the daughter; failing to get the old man's consent, he opens a barber shop and out of this situation springs the fun, a lot of it.

Independent Specials

"THE POWER OF LIGHT" (American), January 5.—This two-reel number features Sydney Ayres as a youth raised in the mountains, his father being a moonshiner. The photography is pleasing and the story exerts a strong pull on the interest, despite the jerkiness of certain scenes. The mountain boy proves an appealing figure and when he goes to the city does not forget the girl he left in the hills. Vivian Rich has the latter part and Charlotte Burton appears as the city girl. The photography is pleasing and the settings well chosen.

"THE RUNAWAY PRINCESS" (Thanhouser), January 6.—A three-reel offering, featuring Maude Fealey as the princess who runs away and comes to America, where she works as a maid. The opening part of the story is simply a variation of Channing Pollock's play, "Such a Little Queen," which has been worked over before in pictures quite frequently. The later scenes possess the most originality. The acting of Miss Fealey and Harry Benham was pleasing, but the settings were rather scanty and did not seem to carry the atmosphere of the continent in the opening scenes.

"WATCH DOG OF THE DEEP" (Imp), January 8.—A two-part special offering with a fresh story by George Edward Hall and produced by Herbert Brenon. Its most interesting portrayal is a disappointed lover bitten by a mad dog and willfully drifting into hydrophobia. This makes an impressive situation though not of the most healthy kind. The picture was taken on an island with a lighthouse and has some vevy good backgrounds. The story chooses the old light keeper as its center of interest and then lets the focus of attention stray from him to the love story in which Leah Baird plays the girl, adopted daughter of the keeper, and William Shay, his son, in love with her. She loves a sailor, played by Edward Mortimer. Leah's dog gets bitten on the shore and goes mad, biting William, who goes crazy. The old man, William Welsh, says that now his son is dead he will mind the light no longer and so imperils a ship with the girl's lover on it. There is a sort of "Shore Acres" with the mad son before he dies.

"THE MAN WHO LIED" (Victor), January 19.—This is rather an unpleasant picture. It is a story of a man who in trying to shield his brother is accused of cowardice and dismissed from the police force. When he goes to the Northwest and obtains a place on the Mounted he again tries to protect the brother, and by his former chief, who has come in pursuit of the evildoer, is again accused of cowardice. In the latter affray he is fatally shot. The brother, from all we can see, escapes justice. Warren Kerrigan plays the one who suffers in the attempt to shield the brother.

"Rebecca the Jewess."

A Six-Part Version of "Ivanhoe," Under the Brand of World's Leader Features.

Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman.

ONE of the great pitfalls for the motion picture interpreter of standard literature is the pre-supposition that everybody has read the book or is at least familiar with the story. While it may not be generally observed, the world is changing in regard to its reading. In America, particularly, life is lived too fast to allow of the reading of long books. This applies to the rising generation as much as it does to us of older years who are in the thick of the fight.

The age of invention has produced such a vast list of conveniences and amusement facilities that life is just one (omitting the adjective) thing after another. There is no time to read long books as there used to be. Before the advent of the electric light, the trolley car, the phonograph, the player-piano, the linotype, the automobile, the Tango, and other things, real and continuous diversion was a rare thing. One of the few dependable amusements of the past generation was the reading of books. The longer the book, the longer the amusement, hence long books were written and most everyone read them.

Scene from "Rebecca the Jewess" (World's Leader).

The linotype has produced a world of snappy books and clever magazines. These, with the other inventions, divide our time to the exclusion of the longer works of Dickens, Scott, Hugo, Dumas and others. And last of all comes the motion picture to claim the spare time of the world at large, which it gets in a great measure. We often hear the motion picture spoken of as the educator of the masses, and that one of its missions is to afford the poor and ignorant an insight into the wealth of the world's literature. To that we heartily agree, but it is certain that the poor and ignorant are not the only ones who are shaky on classic literature. The younger generation has not the time to read that which was at the disposal of us of a former generation. Therefore, if the motion picture is to preserve these classics for a busy world, it must not pre-suppose a previous reading on the part of the spectator.

The principal critical point against this version of Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe" is just that. It takes for granted in a large measure that each and every spectator has read the book. Most of us older folks have read it, but so long ago that it is almost forgotten. That is not so bad, but to one who has never read the book it is easy to imagine that the production in its greater part will be pure Greek.

This is not saying that the defect is fatal, so far as this production is concerned. There are sub-titles that explain the action sufficiently to save it from being a puzzle, but they cut off too quickly. A slow reader would get no more than half through with any one of them when it would vanish and leave him as helpless as before. That is the technical fault with this picture, and a fault so easily remedied that all that has been said should not be construed as a condemnation. The chances are that when the promoters of the picture read this criticism they will quickly double the length of the titles and the trouble will have disappeared by the time the exhibitor gets the picture.

Considering the picture as a production it can be said that the good outweighs the bad. There is an absence of detail in the photography that is a little annoying, due to a granular effect that obscures sharpness. It is what might be termed a "dark" production. There is also a strange mixture in settings. The exteriors are very real and show glimpses of genuine solid English castles. The interiors of those same castles, however, are painted on limp drop curtains that sway before air currents. This, explained by the promoters, is because the interiors were taken on the stage of the Lyceum Theater, London, using the cast of the Lyceum Theater Company which was playing the piece there at the time.

On the other hand, there are some fine features about the picture that help to make up for whatever deficiencies there may be. There are some big battle scenes in the storming of the castle that are impressive on account of the immense number of people used. The exteriors generally are very fine and for that we should forgive the interiors, which are helped out by some highly commendable acting.

The best character of all is Rebecca, played by Miss Edith Brackwell. She looks the part and acts it in a most human way, interpreting it with much fidelity and not once overdoing it. Next best is Rowena, by Miss Nancy Bevington. What she had to do was done well and was enhanced by her physical charm. Isaac of York, by Hubert Carter, though obviously made up, soon caused one to forget that fault and see only his work, which was of the best. "Ivanhoe," by Lauderdale Maitland, Sir Brian by Henry Lonsdale and Front de Boeuf by Austin Milroy, were capably done by actors of evident high experience and intelligence.

EDWARD EARL.

A Forceful but Modest Personality in the Nicholas Power Establishment.

THE growth and development of the business of many of the firms now prominent in the moving picture industry has been phenomenal and it has been no easy matter to provide for the financial requirements occasioned by such rapid growth. The accompanying cut is that of Mr. Edward Earl, the prominent New York banker, who is the treasurer of the Nicholas Power Company. Mr. Earl is connected with large financial interests, is a director of several important New York corporations and president of a large downtown bank. He has been associated with Mr. Nicholas Power for a number of years, and through this close connection has become deeply interested in the development of the motion picture art along the best lines. Mr. Earl is ever busy with his varied duties and evidently averse to publicity. Mr. Earl has had much to do with the splendid system of efficiency and thoroughness which characterizes the Powers plant from the office boy up. He has had much to do with establishing the confidence which for a long time past the name of Powers has inspired all through the industry.

Edward Earl.

PRODUCER AND LEADING LADY MARRIED.

Director Edw. J. Le Saint, of the Selig forces in California, and Miss Stella Razeto, leading lady of Mr. Le Saint's players, were married on Christmas day at the home of the bride's parents in San Diego. Miss Razeto was recently severely injured by a stage coach accident, and had only been out of the hospital a few days when the marriage took place. Mrs. Le Saint does not intend to allow matrimony to interfere with her art, and will continue to scintilate on the motion picture screen. Both bride and groom are immensely popular in the Los Angeles picture colony, and have been the recipients of many gifts and congratulations.

"An American Citizen."

John Barrymore Makes Decided Hit in Famous Players Four-Part Comedy-Drama—Noteworthy Cast.

By George Blaisdell.

THERE is an abundance of fine comedy as there are also many strong dramatic situations in "An American Citizen," adapted from the play of Madeleine Lucette Ryley, which the Famous Players released on January 10. It is a story in which the comedy apparently predominates until suddenly you discover the fun has been pulled out of a situation and that you are looking on gray life. One of the more notable instances of this quick reversal is where John Barrymore dejectedly faces a portrait of the Father of His Country on a table opposite him. He is in financial difficulties; a partner has absconded and the office rent is due. A wealthy relative in England has left him a fortune contingent on marrying an Englishwoman and becoming a British subject. The only apparent chance of restoring to his trusting clients the money they have left with him is to accept the terms imposed by his late uncle. There is a laugh as the screen shows him sadly waving a hand to the first president and saying: "Good-bye, old man!" But as he leans over and from the corner of the frame gently removes an American flag there is an ominous hitch in the mirth. When he presses to his lips the bit of cloth the change is complete. If at home the act strikes deep, imagine the feelings of the expatriate thousands of miles from home.

Scene from "An American Citizen" (Famous Players).

John Barrymore more than makes good on the screen. His performance in the role of Beresford Cruger is unusual in that it is different. It has rare quality. There are the attractiveness of youth, the skill that comes by training, and the talent that is in his blood. In the language of the screen, he always "registers." Evelyn Moore plays Beatrice Carew, the cousin who has been disinherited in favor of Cruger and with whom she makes a loveless marriage for the sake of keeping the money in the family. Miss Moore has a charming personality—and what is better, she has stage intelligence. There are many delicate touches in her portrayal of the woman who is wife in name only. We see the development of the affection from the first meeting until she challenges her husband by standing under the mistletoe in the backroom of the little old bookshop in London on the snowy Christmas eve.

The work of the cast is uniformly excellent. Peter Lang is the whole-souled, jolly senior partner in the firm of Barbury, Brown & Cruger, the firm friend of the junior member. Hal Clarendon is Brown, the partner who takes the bonds from the large safe which is also the refrigerator, and leaves for parts unknown. Howard Missimer, just back from a three months' rest on a farm, is his old self again in the portrayal of the aristocratic Sir Humphry Bunn. Alexander Gaden is the persistent agent of town lots. Wellington A. Playter, who was the gladiator in "A Daughter of the Hills," as the giant English valet makes a pronounced hit. Joe Short, as the office boy, contributes to the comedy, and Ernest Truex, as Mercury, the London newsboy and later assistant in the bookstore, adds much to the effectiveness of the final act.

The settings are elaborate. One scene that would stand out in any production is the representation of the House of Lords across the Thames, with the higher buildings of the city showing in diminishing prominence in the background. There will be many who will fail to realize that this is a studio triumph. Another notable setting is the hotel front in Nice. Not the least effective are the scenes about the office building elevator.

The story holds throughout. In the beginning there is straight comedy until the partners discover that, instead of having no assets, they have real liabilities—through the absconding of Brown. The situations in the hotel, when Cruger, through the excusable blunder of a clerk, is assigned to his wife's room, are full of rollicking fun. The episode of the stocking will upset any house. The best of all, however, are in the last half reel. Barbury gets word that the opera house lot has advanced in price—worth a small fortune, in fact—and seeks out Mrs. Cruger. He brings her to the little bookstore, where Cruger has been busy hanging Christmas greens. As the American sits by the blazing logs—they really are blazing—with his tiny flag in one hand and a faded flower bearing memories of his wife in the other, Mrs. Cruger steps in on him. Gradually she edges her way to the mistletoe as Cruger backs against the wall. When he realizes the situation the end is sudden—and dramatic.

J. Searle Dawley is the producer.

THANHOUSER'S LEADING WOMAN BACK AGAIN.

Miss Marguerite Snow, the popular leading woman of the Thanhouser Company, has just returned to the studio after an absence of six months, during which time she has been taking life easy. Miss Snow had been with the Thanhouser Company three consecutive years before she had taken a vacation. The rest has been greatly beneficial to her, and she feels able to do even better work than heretofore.

Marguerite Snow as the Wife of Potiphar.

The first important multiple reel feature in which Miss Snow appears is "Joseph in the Land of Egypt." In this picture she takes the chief feminine role, that of the wife of Potiphar. The accompanying illustration shows her as such. A few of the most notable multiple reel releases in which Miss Snow has played are "She," "Lucile" and "Jess."

LOOK OUT FOR CHECK FORGER!

Information has reached the office of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company that a young man, light hair, about 5 feet, 9 inches tall, said to be about 35 years of age, usually well dressed, who, when last seen, wore a gray overcoat and a derby hat, has been offering checks as a representative of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

Hotel Redington at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., has already suffered from misrepresentations of this gentleman, who is carrying checks purporting to be voucher checks which are signed by Carl Laemmle, president, and J. C. Graham, general manager. This gentleman has also cashed a check under the name of Roy L. Hardner with the same signatures.

Exchanges, exhibitors, etc., are warned to look out for this gentleman and if possible to notify the Universal Film Manufacturing Co. or Mr. L. J. Gammon, of the American Bankers' Association, 5 Nassau St., New York City.

The Universal Ball.

A Brilliant Social Affair Enlivened by a Mock Free-for-All Fight on the Floor.

THE New York end of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company gave a big reception and ball to its many employees on Saturday evening, January 3rd, at the Leslie Rooms, Eighty-third Street and Broadway.

It was a wild, stormy night, and those who went to the hall did so with the idea that the attendance would be slim on account of the weather, but a glance at the accompanying illustration will show what an erroneous idea that was. The ball was an artistic success. It was not a financial success because it was not intended to be; but just a big family gathering of the whole Universal force, from the humblest factory worker up to the president himself.

The hall was cozy and was tastefully decorated. The floor and the music could not have been better. The company was congenial and orderly; that is, with the exception of one unfortunate incident. King Baggot got into an argument with J. C. Graham on the floor, and it looked, for a moment, as though all the men on the floor would soon be mixed in a free-for-all fight. Four policemen were called in, but they could do little with the surging mob of men. Women were frightened and taking to shelter, and cries of "shame" came from the balcony guests. Mr. Powers and Mr. Swanson pushed their way into the thick of the melee and did their best to stop it. The orchestra struck up a tune to divert attention. Nobody seems to know what the argument was about, but the truth is, it was about nothing. When it seemed about time to send in a riot call the guests were greatly surprised to see King Baggot start turkey-trotting with one of the cops, and some of the boys who were in on the joke danced it with the three other policemen. The fact is, they were four husky gents that Baggot had previously rigged up in studio uniforms. They do say that Pat Powers and Bill Swanson swallowed it hook, line and sinker. They were not alone in their innocence; everyone who was not in on it fell for it, only Pat and Bill fell the hardest.

It was a glorious evening with undiminished gayety from the start at 8 P. M., until the finish at 4 A. M., Sunday. A number of entertaining people appeared on the stage between dances. Mildred Holland gave a dramatic scene from Mary Stuart; Joe Scharf, of the Mecca Universal Exchange, warbled some ditties; several cabaret singers from the music publishing houses of Leo Feist and Watterson, Berlin & Snyder contributed to the occasion, and Dick Lee read off a lot of comedy telegrams.

The entertainment committee was comprised of: William H. Swanson, chairman; King Baggot, Frank Smith, Howard Crampton, Irving Cummings, Ethel Grandon, Florence Lawrence, John Stokes, Matt Moore, Leonora von Ottinger, Irene Wallace, Harry Cohn and J. W. Grey. This committee provided an elegant buffet luncheon, which was served in the spacious dining-room on the floor below the ballroom. The guests were provided with checks and sent down in relays of 200 each.

After the luncheon the guests assembled about the stage at the behest of J. C. Graham, general manager of the Universal. He took occasion then, as spokesman for the entire force of employees, to tell Mr. Laemmle how much they all think of him, and the sincerity of his words left no doubt of it. A little, curly, flaxen-haired boy, Master Philip Weiner, of London, presented a magnificent loving cup to Mr. Laemmle, the gift of the employees. Mr. Laemmle has no wall-cracking voice for making speeches. He usually dodges them, but he responded nicely in this instance. Although his voice could not be heard far, he let out one of the secrets of his success when he concluded his remarks by saying to his people: "I thank you, and I love you."

The grand march then began and was led by Mr. and Mrs. Laemmle, the other officers following in regular order. During the march this photo was taken, with the guests in the formation of a large letter "U."

Among the guests assembled, in addition to the Universal Family, were: George DuBois Proctor, of the Motion Picture News; Wen Milligan, of the Billboard; Mr. Semler, of the New York Telegraph; Hugh Hoffman, of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD; Phillips Smalley, of the West Coast Organization of the Universal; Mr. and Mrs. James V. Bryson, of the Laemmle Film Service, Minneapolis; Miss Mildred Holland, Jules Brulatour, N. Edward Mallouf of the Worlds' Best Film Company, Ch. Jourjon, M. Patin and M. and Mme. Offeman of the Eclair Company, Leo Hershfeld and daughter, Miss Jeanette Cohen and Miss Gladys Tilden of the Blaney Company, David Horsley, Miss Dorothy Gibson, Miss Rose Marks, Miss Edna Ellaby, Joe Farnham.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

OREGON LEAGUE ORGANIZED.

Picture Theater Men Hold Meeting at Portland—Much Good Time Enjoyed By All.

MOTION picture exhibitors from all of the leading cities of Oregon were present December 22 and 23, at the Oregon Hotel, at the opening of the first annual meeting for the purpose of founding a State branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. Melvin G. Winstock, manager of the People's Amusement Company, of Portland, was chosen temporary chairman and presided over all the sessions.

In opening the session, Mr. Winstock gave a short talk upon the development of the motion picture business in the past and some of the immediate developments which it faces.

"Ten years ago a mockery, to-day the motion picture production demands the loyalty of millions who see in it a certain agency which will lead man to a higher and nobler destiny," he said.

"Five years ago the dregs of the drama condescended to act before the camera. To-day we reach out and secure the highest, who, in accepting, consider themselves honored. Distribution, which a few years ago was in chaotic condition, has been reduced to a science," declared Mr. Winstock.

M. E. Cory, of San Francisco, a member of the executive board of the National organization, addressed the members of the newly-formed Oregon branch in behalf of M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati, the National president, who was unable to come to Portland at this time.

He outlined the importance of the work that can be accomplished in the elevation of the motion picture business through organization and co-operation, and told what the league had done already in California and other States.

The visiting delegates were entertained on Monday at a luncheon, at the Commercial Club, by the Film Supply Company of Oregon, and at night they were guests at various theaters of the city. At the afternoon session Christmas gifts of slides were presented by the Grant Carder Slide Company.

Tuesday morning the delegates witnessed an exhibition at the Globe Theater, which probably is unlike any other that has been given on the Pacific Coast. Five rival film supply companies sent their best reels to be used at the exhibition, making a wider representation in one theater than ever before.

Election and installation of officers was held Tuesday, and at the Oregon Hotel, Tuesday night, the first annual banquet of the organization was held. Melvin G. Winstock was toastmaster and Governor West and other prominent men were guests.

Members of the committee on organization were: J. A. Bradt and R. Z. Duke, Portland; F. L. Waters, Salem; W. A. Long, Oregon City, and W. Potter, Springfield. W. E. Stevens is temporary secretary.

Exhibitors who attended the session are: Melvin G. Winstock, H. C. Philips, C. G. Boothly, I. Leeser Cohen, Sol Baum, W. Housman, B. E. Sellerman, R. Z. Duke, Wenzel Kolross, M. B. Donovan, G. T. Holtsclaw, S. S. Range, L. A. Samuelson, Ben F. Hibbard, H. C. Stevens, E. T. Pittmon and J. A. Bradt, Portland; L. F. Cullins, The Dalles; J. Clevedale, Woodlawn; F. A. Buhlert, Salem; W. N. Brown, Newberg; C. E. Oliphant, Pendleton; Harvey Newman, Astoria; W. Potter, Springfield; E. L. Campbell, Eugene; W. L. Perman, Junction City; A. E. Laflan, Salem; J. W. Houston, Klamath Falls; E. E. Small, Corvallis; E. Schnabel, Kenton; W. A. Ayres, Dallas; Mrs. A. B. Sparks, Redmond; Mrs. W. Potter, Springfield; George Whiteside, Corvallis; F. L. Waters, Salem, and W. A. Long, Oregon City.

BUFFALO EXHIBITORS TO DANCE. ..

The annual ball of the Buffalo Exhibitors' Association will be held on Monday evening, January 19th.

NEW YORK STATE COMMITTEE.

A convention of the New York State Exhibitors' Association executive committee will be held at Buffalo, N. Y., on Sunday, January 18th.

EXHIBITORS' ORGANIZATIONS.

THE present conditions in New York City among the moving picture exhibitors should prove an admirable argument for the getting together of the various factions of moving picture exhibitors throughout the country. We have consistently and continually deplored the break in the ranks of the exhibitors and we still maintain that a strong central body of exhibitors in each State in the Union would be of immense benefit to the industry as a whole. Surely the events of the past few months should prove to every fair-minded person that there is considerable work in nearly every State for a representative or executive committee of moving picture exhibitors to watch over very carefully, especially in the matter of unnecessary and pernicious legislation both by State and municipal legislators.

Referring again to conditions in New York City, what do we find? Three separate and distinct organizations, whose interests are practically identical and yet who are being kept apart through needless and useless splitting of hairs and more or less personal antagonism. What is the consequence? Simply that the good work which any strong organization might accomplish is being absolutely neglected and the energies of the various organizations being expended in an endeavor to prove that their own particular contentions are right.

Every exhibitor and official of any of the organizations that we have talked with, all equally deplore the present condition and would welcome any honorable method by which a consolidation could be effected. This should not be at all impossible if each side will realize that concessions can be made without sacrificing either honor or principle, and that nothing is to be gained by any one faction in maintaining an absolute position and refusing to at least meet the other fellow in an endeavor to again weld the organization for the general good and best interests of all concerned.

Undoubtedly the chaotic condition in New York City is typical of conditions in other localities where the present useless bickering is in progress. If our contention, that the interest of the exhibitors in any part of the country is equally the interest of all, is correct, common sense would seem to indicate that any association of exhibitors, to be of greatest value, should secure the interest and co-operation of every individual unit and that unless it does so it will fail to accomplish the best results. Furthermore, the association that not only fails to secure the co-operation and support of practically all the people in the industry, but does not even take knowledge of the fact that the views and opinions of a considerable portion of its, shall we say, individual interests is being ignored, cannot, in our opinion, expect to secure wholehearted and complete support and respect of the industry as a whole.

Every evidence would seem to point to the fact that there is a fairly strong organization at present in the field.

Is it too much to hope that we may see the exhibitors of this city united in one strong organization before many weeks of this year have passed? We see no reason why this should not be an accomplished fact and, from expressions of a genuine desire for such a consummation on the part of some of the New York officials, we are even hopeful that such will be the result.

REDLANDS, CALIFORNIA, GETS CENSORSHIP

The city of Redlands, one of the best-known towns in the California orange belt, has a new Board of Motion Picture Censors. With three picture theaters, the town managed to scrape along without any censors, the managers showing good judgment in selection of films, until one decided that he would open his house on Sunday, and take a silver collection, as city ordinances prohibited the charging of admission. While his course was not opposed or condemned, it was thought best to exercise some supervision over the Sunday exhibit. The Rev. Ralph P. Smith, rector of Trinity Church, and B. A. Small, secretary of the Y. M. C. A., were appointed censors and chose Mrs. M. G. Van Loan to act with them. They will look over only the Sunday exhibits. The city trustees have decided that if the people want Sunday shows, and the managers are willing to abide by the censors' decision, that they will not interfere. The other two houses will probably fall in line.

NEW YORK CITY EXHIBITORS.

Unusual Progress Being Made by the New York Association in Bettering Local Conditions.

LARGELY due to the untiring efforts of President Trigger, of the New York City Association, there has been unusual progress made in organizing the local exhibitors and the consequent bettering of trade conditions. In the Williamsburg district, where the picture theaters for some time have had something in the nature of general truck markets, nearly every exhibitor has joined the branch association and stopped the "country store," at the same time he has raised his prices of admission from "four-for-five" to ten cents for Saturdays, Sundays and holidays.

The latest meeting of the Williamsburg and East New York branch was held at the Grand Theater, 743 Grand Street, Brooklyn, Monday night, January 5. Mr. Garrett was in the chair and sixty-four members were present. Charles Hollender, of the East New York branch, was present and made some excellent suggestions to the Williamsburgers. President Trigger and State Vice-President B. E. Cornell of Syracuse were also present and gave some good advice to the members.

At the suggestion of Mr. Hollender a subscription was taken up to defray the expenses of a hall for a social entertainment to be given by the Williamsburg and East New York branches.

SOUTH BROOKLYN EXHIBITORS ORGANIZE.

A meeting of the exhibitors in the South Brooklyn district was held at the Acme Theater, 48th Street and Third Avenue, Brooklyn, on Tuesday evening, January 6. There were twenty-seven exhibitors present and President Samuel Trigger presided. An election of officers was held with the following result: Chairman, Rudolph Sanders; secretary, Philip Gootenberg. There was appointed a membership committee consisting of Mr. Tobias, Mr. Gootenberg and the chair to solicit membership among the exhibitors not already allied with the branch. The district covers South Brooklyn, Bay Ridge, Bath Beach, Borough Park and Homewood.

The next meeting will be held at Tuxedo Theater, 54th Street and 13th Avenue, on Wednesday evening, January 14, at 11 o'clock p.m.

PREPARING FOR OHIO CONVENTION.

Word comes from Cincinnati that great preparations are now being made for the annual convention of the members of the Ohio Exhibitors' League and the National Executive Committee in that city on January 26 to 29. It is hoped that every member of the Ohio League will be present and the members of the Kentucky League, after meeting at Covington on January 27, will adjourn and attend the Ohio convention in a body.

There will be a large manufacturers' exposition in the Sinton Hotel, where all meetings of the league will be held and there will be plenty of social features to engage the spare time of the visitors. A banquet and a dance on the evening of the 29th will conclude the event.

CONVENTION OF THE MISSOURI STATE LEAGUE.

On Tuesday, January 20th, the Missouri State Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, will hold a special meeting at the Sexton Hotel, Kansas City, Missouri. This will be the semi-annual meeting of the State Branch and every exhibitor, whether a member of the league or not is urged to make special effort to attend this meeting.

The Kansas City Local No. 1 will have charge of the entertainment end of the program, which assures the exhibitors a royal good time. Any trades that wish to exhibit their goods can make application for space to F. L. Welch, Sexton Hotel, Kansas City, Missouri.

NOTICE OF GENERAL MEETING.

A meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors of Greater New York will be held at the Imperial Hotel, on Monday morning, January 12th, at 11 a.m.

Matters of the most vital importance to all exhibitors will be taken up and the ventilating question will be explained to all members who do not thoroughly understand it. A number of officials have been invited. All exhibitors in Greater New York are requested to attend, as we think it is time that they should spend an hour or two at our meetings so as to be enlightened in reference to laws and ordinances pertaining to our business, now before the respective law-making bodies.

If you are an exhibitor and desirous of doing something for the welfare of the exhibitor, do not fail to attend.

"HARA-KIRI."

A Beautiful Japanese Subject in Three Parts Now Being Offered by the Apex Co.

ONE can forgive anything in a picture if it is a pretty thing to look at. There isn't much of anything to forgive in this offering, except possibly the chase, but if it were the most commonplace kind of a chase we could be very happy in looking at it because of the many beautiful landscapes it takes us through.

This production throughout is a delight to the eye. It passes from one exquisite scene to another, and this more than atones for the fact that some of the Japanese characters are obviously not native Japs. By some queer process of reasoning, the only actor in the play who had a natural Japanese cast of countenance was given the part of Ivan, a Russian officer. He should have been cast for the part of "Cabul," the grouchy old Japanese white-slaver. But it doesn't matter much. A thing of beauty is a joy forever, so why worry about the details?

Scene from "Hara-Kiri." (Apex).

The story itself is not a wonder, but is possible and plausible and sufficient to justify the succession of dainty scenes that carry it through. It is all about a couple of Russian army officers who are in Japan after the Japanese-Russian War. One of them loves a geisha girl, but she, maiden like, loves the other, who is not especially smitten with her. The two men are both ordered back to Russia, where they quarrel over a countess who loves the same fellow who won the heart of the Japanese girl. The other officer attempts to force his attentions upon the countess and he is killed in a quarrel with his brother officer, Andre, after having told her of Andre's Japanese love affair. Andre with the aid of the countess flees to Japan, with the police in pursuit. The chase that follows is a lively and thrilling affair. There are parts in it that take one's breath away, and one of them is a genuine accident, that where Andre's horse jumps a railway gate and falls upon him.

Andre reaches Japan and finds the Japanese girl. Old Cabul has been making life miserable for her. The countess arrives later with a pardon and Cabul gets her story and Andre's. He tells Mimosa, the Japanese girl, of Andre's falseness and the little girl in her grief commits "hara-kiri," the Japanese term for suicide.

This production is without a doubt the best one the Apex Company has ever handled. We recommend it to any exhibitor.

A SUCCESSFUL WASHINGTON ORGANIZATION.

Colonel John J. Noonan, head of the John J. Noonan Enterprises, returned shortly since from a seven months' tour in Europe. He brought with him Mrs. Noonan, also his daughter, Louise, who has been in Germany studying music for the last three years.

One of the first things that Mr. Noonan did on his return was to grant a two weeks' vacation and trip by way of New York to Virginia to Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Alvine. Mr. Alvine is manager for Mr. Noonan of the popular Virginia Theater in Washington, D. C., and was enthusiastic in his appreciation of the various members of the Noonan organization. The New York office of the Moving Picture World was favored with a short visit by Mr. and Mrs. Alvine on their way to the South.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"A QUESTION OF RIGHT" (Lubin).

A dramatic incident in the life of a politician, involving the strange question as to whether a wife is justified in denouncing her husband, whom she discovers to be dishonest and a grafter. The cast is an admirable one and the stage setting unusually beautiful.

Louise Gray marries Mayor Hogan under the belief that he is an upright man. In doing so she has rejected Vance, a city detective. Hogan is a scheming, crooked politician, and Jim Gray, who is Louise's brother, is blackmailing Hogan because of his relations with another woman. Louise soon learns of Hogan's true character and sees her husband receive a big bribe, and determines to expose him to his colleagues, despite the fact that it will end her happiness. An enthusiastic crowd call at Hogan's home and notify him of his renomination for Mayor. In the midst of her husband's speech of acceptance, Louise denounces him as a crook. Hogan exhibits terrible anger and threatens her so much that she decides to leave him. As she prepares to go she finds his murdered body in the library. Vance, her former lover, calls to cover the case, and, despite Louise's protestations, believes her guilty and proceeds to put her through the "third degree." The fearful ordeal renders Louise temporarily insane, and she admits she had killed her husband. At the same moment her brother is discovered in a closet where he has been trapped in trying to escape. He confesses that he killed Hogan for the latter's refusal to give him more blackmail money. Louise is exonerated and Vance remains steadfast in his desire to marry her.

OLD AUTHOR WRITES FOR BLACHE.

Herbert Blache has just completed a four-part feature entitled "Hook and Hand." This scenario was written by Frank W. Doughty, the author of the "Old King Brady" detective stories. "Hook and Hand" is a remarkable living character. He is at the present time serving a fifteen year sentence in the Montana State Penitentiary. The incidents in the story woven around "Hook and Hand" are real facts from his very sensational career. The writer, Mr. Doughty, tells us that he is one of the most peculiar characters he has ever dealt with in the criminal world.

WANTS NEW NAME FOR "ALKALI IKE."

The Universal Company, which has engaged Augustus Carney, the "Alkali Ike" of the Essanay productions, is offering twenty-five dollars for the best suggestion for a new name for Mr. Carney's production with his new connection.

"THE MILITANT" (Imp).

Calder Johnstone, scenario editor of the Eastern branch of the Universal, is the author of this three reel drama which finds its motives in one of the most important political problems of the civilized world "woman's suffrage." The question is being solved in America without resort to militancy. But England is in the throes of social and political upheaval and militancy because the women have been refused the vote.

Mr. Johnstone, in writing this play, has not attacked the right of woman to the vote. He has confined himself to the effort of showing that the destruction of property, of homes and of lives is the wrong way of going about getting it. It is a big subject that he has taken and he has handled it in a big way. He has brought the question down to the concrete.

Naturally there is much spectacularism in the picture with the crowds, the destruction of railroad tracks, the dynamiting of buildings and the raids on the meetings by the police. It was during the making of this picture that perhaps one of the most unusual incidents that ever occurred in the producing of a picture happened. On last election the director had taken his enlarged company over to one of the principal New York polling places for a suffragette meeting and subsequent stampede. Just prior to the giving of the signal by the director to start the scene, a man was run down and killed by an auto across the street. A huge crowd of men immediately gathered. Before explanations could be made, "supers" charged the curious onlookers, mistaking them for some of their own and the latter, believing they were being seriously attacked, fought back. A general fight, amounting to a riot, ensued. But the camera man, alive to his duty, turned the crank and caught the scene.

Several prominent suffragettes were secured to enact certain roles in the play. It was released January 12.

TO FILM "AFTER THE BALL."

Charles K. Harris, publisher of popular songs, who first came into world-wide prominence as writer of the first of the famous popular songs, "After the Ball," tell us that he has made all arrangements to have that song produced in a three-part motion picture and that the work is under way. Mr. Harris is to be congratulated upon this decision. The song in question lends itself admirably to the uses of the picture maker and should be of great interest. Incidentally, its appearance on the screen is certain to revive interest in the song.

Mr. Harris says that he intends to produce other pictures based upon his numerous song hits.

"THE GIRL AT THE CURTAIN" (Essanay).

The author of "The Girl at the Curtain" has given us many situations that make this two-reel production interesting throughout. Good photography prevails and the characters are handled well.

Warren Bradley (Francis X. Bushman) learns that there is a peculiar provision in his uncle's will, which bequeaths him half of a very large fortune. But in order to get the money he is to marry a distant relative, a young lady whom he has never seen. Bradley is willing to marry anybody to get the money, but not so the young lady, who refuses to have anything to do with him; in fact, refuses even to see him. Bradley wires her, "Then you will marry me without seeing me." Mary Burns (Beverly Bayne), to save her uncle's home, agrees to marry Bradley without seeing him, so the two are united, a curtain between them. Some time later Mrs. Bradley applies to a kind-hearted attorney to secure a position for her as stenographer. The shrewd wizard of the law gives her a letter of introduction to her husband and she takes up her new duties at the typewriter. It is not until some time later that she discovers that Bradley is her husband, and she becomes jealous when she hears him talking to young ladies over the telephone and making appointments with them. One day, while Bradley is talking to a young lady over the 'phone, telling her "as soon as I can get my divorce I will marry you," Mary picks up her hat and coat and leaves. Bradley finds the telegram in her drawer (that he had sent her), "Then you will marry me without seeing me," and for the first time realizes that he has been working in the same office with his wife for months without knowing it. He dashes after her—finds her at home. The little love god takes possession of his heart, and the two determine that they shall never again be separated, and so it was that a blind love had its eyes opened to the sunshine and goodness of the world.

This production is booked for release Friday, January 30th.

GEORGE KLEINE PREPARES ELABORATE HERALD.

Believing that exhibitors would appreciate a type of herald befitting "Antony and Cleopatra," George Kleine has issued a very neat eight-page booklet entitled "The Story of Antony and Cleopatra," in place of the usual cheaply printed and hurriedly thrown together herald. The booklet was printed in 2,000,000 lots on a good grade of India tint paper, profusely illustrated with dainty vignetted cuts and is saddle stitched. It is the sort of herald that the average man would put in his pocket and take home to read.

"A DANGEROUS EXPERIMENT" (Victor).

"A Dangerous Experiment" is an up-to-date screen play abounding in the occult and psychology. Though it is daring in theme there is not an incident or scene in the whole two reels that offends reason. On the contrary, it drives home conviction and assures one of the fact that there are somethings in this world that are too strange for the lay mind to grasp or understand.

The situation evolved in the play by Jack Byrne and Walter MacNamara is unique.

Here is the big situation tied up in a nutshell. An undersized student has a rival in the school athlete for the love of a girl. The student, interested in the occult, brings about a transition of souls; that is to say, he transfers his soul into the body of the athlete and forces the athlete's soul into his own. After the completion of the experiment the student is unable to change back. Around this situation is written a love story of unusual merits, and the possibilities for acting, for character studies are tremendous.

The souls of the two men are seen actually traveling from one body to the other. When the athlete finds himself locked up in the puny body of the student his anguish is awful. His football companions who formerly looked up to him as their peerless leader now laugh in derision at his pitious attempts to tell them who he really is. The student, when self-endowed with the athlete's body and finding it impossible to get back, smashes in blind rage the crystal which he used in making the exchange. January 23 is the release date.

WM. FOX CENTRALIZES HIS EXCHANGES.

When William Fox, the theatrical manager, moves into the Leavitt Building, at No. 126 West Forty-sixth Street, he will have two floors devoted exclusively to the film rental business—one for the regular service of the General Film Company's program, the other for features, comprising the major part of the Exclusive Supply Corporation's program. These and a third floor, which will contain the executive and theatrical offices, will be occupied beginning January 15th.

The fifth floor will be occupied by the Box Office Attractions Film Rental Company, the new ramification of the Fox enterprises, which concerns itself with features only—five a week now, and more to follow. Abraham Carlos, who has gone through the feature market with a fine tooth comb, contracting for the best, will be in general charge. There will be two projecting rooms equipped with two projection machines each. In each room, every morning from 9 o'clock till 12, features will be run for the exhibitor. There will be specially-equipped rooms for the exhibition of posters and other advertising matter on each feature.

On the seventh floor, the Greater New York Film Rental Company, which handles the "licensed" service, will be equipped to accommodate its slightly varying requirements. Louis Rosenbluh, in charge since its inception by William Fox, will continue in office. The Exclusive Program is now controlled by the Box Office Attractions Film Rental Company for New York City and State, Northern New Jersey and New England. Offices will be opened in Buffalo. An office in Boston will cover New England. Mr. Carlos is to go to Europe on February 1st to contract for several more brands.

RENFAX TALKING PICTURES.

Messrs. Fox & Wolff, trading under the name of "Renfax," are ready to offer to exhibitors what appears to be a satisfactory talking picture service on a rental basis. A representative of the Moving Picture World was given an opportunity to observe the working of the Renfax device and what he heard and saw proved that a very interesting number of a motion picture theater program might be provided by the Renfax folk. The numbers exhibited at that time were popular songs and the "tango"—four on a reel; synchronization seemed perfect and the pictured action was well put on.

It is the purpose of the Renfax people to offer this service at a reasonable price on weekly rental. The exhibitor will be required to purchase a phonograph, but the rest of the service, such as the reels and records, will be rented.

Admitting the possibility of animated songs becoming a part of motion picture programs, much of that possibility depends upon the character of the numbers furnished. It will be remembered that the old "illustrated song" lost its hold on picture audiences because of its deterioration. The cheap "mush stuff" prevailed to such an extent that general disgust was aroused. If Renfax will stear clear of that rock it may establish itself in picture theaters.

The promoters of Renfax assert that they have ample capital to properly carry their enterprise past the experimental stages and to enable them to produce good numbers. Offices of the company will be found on the seventh floor of the World's Tower Building, West 40th Street, New York City.

"WRECKED IN MID-AIR."

A Kleine-Eclipse three-reel for release January 27, 1914. The story features that redoubtable character, Joe Hamman, whose dare-devil feats before the camera are well known to American picture fans. In this release Hamman flies a Bleriot monoplane. With his wife in the machine, the aeroplane blows up some seventy-five feet above the ground and falls to the earth, carrying the couple with it amid a shower of debris. There is neither sub-title nor film cutting to give an air of unreality to the scene. It is merely a hazardous and dangerous feat which would have constituted an Associated Press item, had it happened to a well known aviator as it actually occurred before the camera. The release is characterized by beautiful photography and splendid acting.

Scene from "Wrecked in Mid-Air" (Kleine-Eclipse).

LASKY WILL MAKE "BREWSTER'S MILLIONS" PICTURE.

Having advanced the production of "The Squaw Man" picture to a point of practical completion in so far as the taking of the various scenes are concerned, the Lasky picture forces are now turning their attention to the production of "Brewster's Millions," which is to be the second release. It will be a five-reel number.

The Lasky studio at Hollywood, Cal., is fast nearing completion and will be ready for occupancy by February 1st. Cecil B. DeMille and Oscar Apfel will remain on the Coast indefinitely.

"BY WHOSE HAND" NOT GREAT NORTHERN.

In last week's issue of The Moving Picture World announcement was made that the feature subject, "By Whose Hand," being distributed by the Great Northern Special Feature Film Company, was a Great Northern Film Company's subject. The item was incorrect in crediting the subject to the Great Northern; it should have been Films Lloyds.

"THE RETURN OF HELEN REDMOND" (American).

This production is deserving of especial mention because of the working out of detail by the producer, Thomas Ricketts. The dramatization is splendidly carried out by Winifred Greenwood and Ed. Coxen supported by prominent stars such as George Field, Wm. Tedmarsh, Edith Borella, and others—familiar characters of the "Flying A" companies.

The story presents a genuine pathetic appeal and sounds a convincing note of warning against the frivolous consideration of matrimony.

Winifred Greenwood interprets the titular role of Helen Redmond with a realism that lends conviction. In the story she accepts a proposal made as a wager and before the spirits of a night of frolic have subsided she becomes the wife of Neil Forrester, the brother of a minister. The two parties represent almost two extremes in social life—the one an ardent exponent of the stage and the other reared in the sacred precincts of the church, they could hardly be expected to harmonize. After a few months of happiness inevitable discontent and friction arise and separation results. The father dies leaving the daughter to the care of his brother, the minister. After years of anguish and worry the woman is convinced of the errors of her ways and in the end is happily united with her daughter. The settings are beautiful and photographic quality perfect.

BALBOA COMPANY GIVES CHRISTMAS DINNER.

A most pretentious social event at the Hotel Virginia, Long Beach, was the dinner and dance given by the Balboa Feature Film Company on Christmas Eve. Sixty people, including H. M. Horkheimer, president and manager of the company, sat down to the sumptuous dinner. During the dinner Bertram Bracken, managing director of the company, on behalf of the members of the company presented Mr. Horkheimer with a handsome silver loving cup.

After dinner the guests who had been invited for the dance began to arrive. Among the guests present were: Miss Mary Pickford, Mrs. Pickford, Miss Laura Oakley, Miss Ruth Roland, Miss Clara Grant Mr. and Mrs. Isidore Bernstein, J. Warren Kerrigan, Mr. Francis Grandin, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Nash, Mr. and Mrs. William Clifford, Miss Bertha Rush, Miss Gladys Rutledge, Mr. Lawrence Flatau, Miss Billie Bennett and Miss Velma Whitman.

CANADIAN-BIOSCOPE OPENS N. Y. OFFICE.

The Canadian Bioscope Co., of Halifax, Nova Scotia, has opened offices in the Candler building. Mr. H. T. Oliver, who has been connected with the Edison and Reliance Co., has just been made vice-president and general manager. The officers of the new company are: H. H. B. Holland, president; H. T. Oliver, vice-president, John Strachan, treasurer, and T. P. Payne, secretary. The first release of the Canadian Bioscope Co., a five-reel classic, will be ready about January 15th. Mr. Clarence Schottenfels is sales manager.

PHOTOGRAPHY'S QUEER PRANKS.

There is a good deal of unintentional comedy in a scene from "The Loafer," by the Reliance Company, on page 182 of our January 10th issue. This is supposed to be a very tragic scene, but as it appears, Sue Balfour is balancing a cigarette on her nose, and George Siegman is holding her in position to shoot it off. Of course, this doesn't appear in the film, but only in the still picture, and is caused by some white object on the back wall.

CONTINENTAL FEATURE FILM CO.

The latest subsidiary company of the Mutual Film Corporation to be organized is known as the Continental Feature Film Company, just formed for the purpose of supplying features to Mutual exchanges. It is located at 219 Sixth avenue and W. C. Toomey is the manager in charge.

CALIFORNIA FILM EXCHANGE MOVES.

On account of its recent fire, the California Film Exchange, of Los Angeles, has taken new quarters at 736 South Olive Street, that city, where business is going on without interruption and things are in much better shape than before. All former patrons are welcome and will be well taken care of.

M. E. HOFFMAN AND JULES BERNSTEIN CHANGE.

Jules Burnstein and M. E. Hoffman, of the World Special Films Corporation, have become associated with Mr. Louis J. Selznick in the Photoplays Sales Company, formed to buy exclusive special features for the United States. Their first purchase is a four-reel Paris Eclair "The Conspiracy; or, A Four Million Dollar Dowry," which will be marketed through the offices of the World Special Films Corporation.

"THE FAITH OF HER FATHERS" (Reliance).

The delicate handling of a really great subject is responsible for the marked success of "The Faith of Her Fathers" as a screen production. The very nature of the subject makes it better suited to picture story telling than would be possible in any other form of presentation. It is a story that is actually improved by the absence of lines or speeches and Edgar Lewis, who is responsible for its staging, made the most of the wonderful possibilities it offered for strong effects.

Scene from "The Faith of her Fathers" (Reliance).

The deep heart struggles of a beautiful Jewess, played cleverly by Irene Hunt, who is courted by a man not of her faith, is tempted to be ashamed of her father's means of gaining a livelihood, is placed in a false position by a foolish but innocent act, but who is eventually taught a great lesson in a strange manner, is the foundation for the plot of this intensely absorbing drama, which reaches its natural climax at the end of two reels.

George Siegmann, as the father of Irene Hunt, has created a character that should go a long way toward placing him at the very top of the list of artistic character actors—released January 17th.

"THE SWORD OF DAMOCLES" (Patheplay).

This two-part release has a plot out of the ordinary, the story being built around an unsuccessful genius whose great opera is practically stolen from him by a successful but ordinary composer. Irving Cummings and Eleanor Woodruff furnish acting that is first class and the play is strongly dramatic.

Hodgson, the down at the heels genius, has composed an opera which he knows will make him famous. However, he can gain a hearing nowhere, and discouraged with life takes to drink. Thus he alienates the sympathies of his near neighbor, Ella Marvin, who has a fine voice and who, through the intercession of Winston, a successful composer, has gained the hearing her talents deserve.

How Winston gains possession of the precious manuscript, gets Ella to take the leading part in the new opera and how retribution overtakes him on the very threshold of great fame make up the story of a first class release.

WHYTE'S PLANT.

Affords Fine Printing Facilities Near the City.

A. G. Whyte is one of the younger generation of motion picture pioneers. He was in with the "boomers" when things were crude and profits large. There is no phase of the industry which is strange to him, and his youth and energy will make him loom large in the film horizon of the future.

Mr. Whyte, realizing the constantly growing demand for good printing facilities, has now embarked in the business of printing, and has established a good working plant in West Orange. It is located at the corner of Park Avenue and Valley Road, and, though in operation only a short time, there are orders coming in rapidly, and the plant is working to its capacity practically all the time.

The plant has a capacity of 200,000 feet per week. It is provided with three drums of 2,000 capacity each, and the developing facilities are up to a good standard. The printing rooms are well equipped, and there is every facility for tinting. Altogether, the plant is as efficient as it is compact, and, being so near to the center of things, it affords every convenience to all who need printing done in a quick, thorough and reliable manner.

"COMING HOME" (Eclair).

For a story of pathos and real heart sentiment, this Eclair feature has seldom been equalled. It points out the wide gulf between the stage and the pulpit, and shows that, although the characters of both these walks of life have entirely different interests, yet the one all embracing power of mother love makes them as one. A film of tender scenes and strong emotional acting and will arouse a strong train of thought in the brains of those who see it. This is a two-part subject and will be released January 21.

BALBOA COMPANY'S SCENARIO CONTEST.

To stimulate interest among the photoplaywrights in Europe and America to write better screen stories, the Balboa Amusement Producing Company has decided to offer a cash prize of $200 for the best three reel drama to be submitted to the company before May 1, 1914.

In making this offer, the Balboa Company reserves the right to reject any scenario submitted and to buy any at whatever price the officers of the company see fit. In submitting scenarios, writers are requested not to write any drama of military or western origin, as these will not be available for the company's use.

All scenarios are to be typewritten with synopsis and scene schedule and are to be accompanied by a self-addressed, stamped envelope for return. A staff of competent critics will pass on the merits of the scenarios submitted, the winner being announced through the medium of the trade papers as soon after the first of May as possible. Scenarios are to be sent to the Balboa Amusement Producing Company, 806 Security Building, Los Angeles, Cal.

THE COBBS ARE BACK.

C. Lang Cobb, representing Ramo, and Agnes Egan Cobb, of the Union and Features Ideal, have returned from a business trip through the Middle West. They report a number of good contracts for their respective firms.

NEW PICTURE CONCERN.

Aubrey M. Kennedy Announces a Feature Sales Company and Another to Make 'Em.

Aubrey M. Kennedy, who organized The American Film Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, and who until recently was general manager of The Pacific Coast Studios of The Universal Film Company, has opened offices at 110 W. 40th street, the World's Tower Building, where he has started a sales campaign for "Kennedy Features," a new brand of feature productions, presenting Constance Crawley, the famous English tragedienne, and Arthur Maude, her leading man. The first two productions of this new concern are now ready for exhibition.

Mr. Kennedy asserts that he will make one release of a three to five reel production; one every two weeks. The first production of the "Kennedy Features" is entitled "The Bride of Lammermoor," an adaptation from Sir Walter Scott's romance of the same name. This production is in three parts; the length, approximately three thousand feet. This will be shipped from New York to buyers on January 21st to be followed two weeks later by Maurice Maeterlinck's version of "Mary Magdalene," likewise in three parts.

Associated with Mr. Kennedy in a new manufacturing company is Irving C. Ackerman, president of the Western States Vaudeville Association, a director of the Orpheum Circuit and president of the Hippodrome Company of Los Angeles and San Francisco. He is president of the company. The secretary and treasurer is Charles L. Cole, who has been general manager of the Pantages Circuit for several years. This company has no connection with the Kennedy Features, Inc.

UNIVERSAL PROSPERING UNDER LAEMMLE.

The best evidence of the fact that Carl Laemmle is guiding the Universal Film Manufacturing Company to prosperity is the continued declaration by the Board of Directors of the monthly dividend of one-half of one per cent. on the preferred stock and one per cent. on the common stock. Since Mr. Laemmle has taken the reins of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company in his hands, personally, the company has made rapid strides.

Through Mr. Laemmle's personal direction, several large features have been made that have netted the company a great profit. His energetic methods have produced for the company such a large revenue that the Board of Directors were able to declare an extra two per cent. dividend on the common stock.

Mr. Laemmle is handling the Universal situation most admirably, and at no time in the history of the company has the organization been so prosperous.

NEW CANADIAN FEATURE COMPANY.

Mr. Alfred Lake, former proprietor of the Criterion Theater, in Toronto, Can., and Ernest G. Noble, late with the Consolidated Feature Film Company, in the same city, have entered into the feature renting field under the style of Noble & Lake, with offices in Toronto. They contemplate opening a similar office in Montreal, and as these gentlemen have the double advantage of exhibiting and the exchange business, they hold very optimistic hopes of making their venture a success.

Mr. Noble just left New York after purchasing the best features this market afforded and he invites the exhibitors in Eastern Canada, including Ontario and Quebec, to get in touch with this new company in order that they procure the very latest feature productions.

CYRIL SCOTT AS FAMOUS PLAYER.

Following John Barrymore in the famous romantic comedy, "An American Citizen," the Famous Players will release, on January 20th, Cyril Scott, in Louis Joseph Vance's popular novel, "The Day of Days." Cyril Scott, who won such success on the stage in "The Prince Chap," "The Lottery Man," "Royal Mounted," and other famous plays, is ideally cast in "The Day of Days" as a young bookkeeper named Perceval, who doesn't know what an adventure is until fate chooses him as the central character in one of the strangest plots ever written about the life of the metropolis. The story develops into a kaleidoscopic drama, with New York at night as a background.

"THE MERCHANT OF VENICE" (Rex).

The Smalleys four-reel production of "The Merchant of Venice" is completed at the Pacific Coast studios. It is one of the most elaborate, from the point of costly costumes and scenery, that the Universal has ever turned out. So careful have the Smalleys been to render the production technically correct that many of the Venitian street scenes were repainted four and five times before they would answer the specific requirements of the producers.

Notes of the Trade

ROSEMARY THEBY, well known as a Vitagraph and Reliance star, will make her initial appearance under the Lubin banner as Harry Myers' leading woman in "A Question of Right," released in two reels on January 15th. Miss Theby's many admirers will welcome this picture with much enthusiasm.

BUFFALO.

A SPECIAL feature department in charge of E. Meadows has been opened at the Buffalo branch of the General Film Company at 122 Pearl Street. This will take the place of the exclusive service of the company. The first release was Charles Kleine's Broadway Success, "The Third Degree." A private exhibition of this film recently at the Globe Theater, Buffalo, was enthusiastically received. The idea of giving exhibitors an opportunity to view in advance important features of this kind is proving popular.

"This plan," said Mr. Meadows, "does away with the necessity of buying a 'cat in a bag.' An exhibitor knows exactly what he is getting when he books a much advertised feature."

The new department in charge of Mr. Meadows is meeting a long felt want and promises to be very successful.

The World Special Films Corporation has opened a branch office at 503 White building, Buffalo, with H. G. Segal in charge. Mr. Segal has had a wide experience in the moving picture business. Under the head "Reel Logic," he has sent out to local exhibitors a well-worded circular, which is a business getter. He says in part: "Shown under proper conditions, feature productions are the quickest and surest means to honest wealth now open to man, but showmen must be guided by demonstrated proofs, not mere high-sounding claims."

"Protea" and "The Last Days of Pompeii," shown recently at the Bijou Theater, were furnished by Mr. Segal.

D. J. Savage, manager of the Buffalo branch of the Mutual Film Corporation, has added the top floor of the building at 272 Washington Street to his quarters. More room was necessary on account of the increased business of the branch, and it is expected that the whole building will be used later by the company. A Mutual two-reel feature, furnished by Mr. Savage, entitled "A Shriner's Daughter," was shown to good advantage recently at the Family Theater. Manager Foster, of this house, properly exploited the attractive paper used with this film.

According to a Canadian report, Gus Schlesinger, former manager of the Academy Theater, Buffalo, is meeting with success as manager of the Theater Francais, Montreal. Mr. Schlesinger has changed the policy of the Montreal Theater from three to two shows a day. His successor at the Academy is his brother, M. B. Schlesinger, formerly manager of the Lee Avenue Theater, Brooklyn. He previously occupied a similar position with the Casino Theater, Chicago.

D. J. Chatkin, manager of the Buffalo branch of Warner's Features, Incorporated, of 23 West Swan Street, and his brother, A. Chatkin, sent out attractive year-end greetings to their customers. The thanks of the senders for patronage were neatly expressed and the cards were appreciated by the recipients.

At the recent annual election of the Buffalo Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, Harry Marsey, proprietor of the Happy Hour Theater, was elected president. The other officers chosen were: Mrs. J. Biehling, Fillmore Palace Theater, secretary; Sol Swerdloff, Amherst Theater, vice-president; and E. J. Heath, Temple Theater, treasurer. An exhibitors' ball will probably be held at the Broadway Auditorium in January.

The University Theaters, Inc., of this city, which will build a theater near Syracuse University, has begun a contest with a view to selecting a name for the house. Many college men are among the contestants and the results will be announced February 1. One cash prize and four others made up of season's passes to the theater, will be given. Harold Edel, president, and Merton H. Schwartz, vice-president, have recently visited Syracuse to keep in touch with the progress being made by the company.

Manager John R. Laughlin has begun a Sunday series of motion pictures at the Majestic Theater. The shows begin at 1:30 o'clock and run up to 11 p. m. The general admission is 10 cents.

The Frontier Moving Picture Theater at West Avenue and Rhode Island Street, was opened recently. The owners are John Maher, Miss Anna Jordan and W. S. Bennett. The heating, ventilation and decorations of the house are modern in every detail. Mutual and Universal pictures are used.

Work on the new Gayety Theater is progressing rapidly. Moving pictures will be occasionally added to the regular burlesque program of the house. John M. Ward, formerly of Detroit, will be manager.

By means of coupons the Buffalo Times has distributed several thousand photographs of prominent moving picture artists. The coupons are given free at several local theaters and may be exchanged for the pictures at the newspaper office.

Moving pictures were used recently by Rev. R. B. Tolbert at the First Congregational Church, Niagara Falls, to illustrate a sermon. "The sermon with pictures," said the minister, "is no longer an experiment. The pictures aid the congregation in gaining a better understanding of the sermon. I am confident that the innovation will be a success here."

The fact that the Academy Theater, Buffalo, which now plays vaudeville and moving pictures, was at one time the home of the legitimate drama, is recalled by the recent death of Henry L. Meech, of this city. Mr. Meech and his brother, John H. Meech, took over the management of the old Academy in 1868. Among those who paced the boards of the house while Meech Bros. were in charge were Edwin Forrest, Edwin Booth, Lawrence Barrett, Mary Anderson and others. Henry Meech in recent years met with business reverses and for some time before his death was custodian of the Elmwood Music Hall, of this city.

Moving pictures showing the journey of John Henry Mears, a New York newspaperman who went around the world in a little less than thirty-six days, was a recent offering at the Lyceum Theater, Rochester. Mr. Mears lectured in connection with the pictures.

A Santa Claus who distributed gifts among the children in the audience was an extra attraction furnished during Christmas week by Manager Marcus, of the New Lyric Theater, Buffalo. A Christmas tree loaded with presents was placed on the stage.

Despite the protest of a clergyman, the Buffalo Aldermen recently recommended the granting of a permit to Edward H. Koch to build a moving picture theater on Broadway between Adams and Gray Streets. Other petitions granted were Broadway Amusement Co. to build a $75,000 structure at Broadway and Madison Street; Morris Cantor to build a theater at Pratt and Genesee Streets; Le Roy Upton to build a moving picture theater at Nos. 523-27 Grider Street.

The Mitchell H. Mark Palace Theater Co. has been incorporated in Buffalo with a capital stock of $400,000. The directors are Mitchell H. Mark, Moe Mark, Samuel Weil, Eugene L. Falk and E. L. Marshall. The Hub Amusement Co., capitalized at $140,000, has also been organized. The directors are Mitchell H. Mark, Moe Mark, Adolph Spangenthal and Mr. Falk.

The new Winter Garden Theater in North Main Street, Jamestown, N. Y., was recently opened. This will be used as an exclusive picture house, although a stage sufficiently large for vaudeville has been built. The house faces Main Street, with an ornamental front nearly 100 feet on the street line. It was built and will be operated by the Mozart Amusement Co., of which M. L. Wood and M. S. Peterson are chief stockholders. They also operate two other picture houses in Jamestown.

Miss Jean Adair, appearing at Shea's Theater in "Beauty Is But Skin Deep," entertained the members of her company to a Christmas dinner. There was a Christmas tree on the stage in her honor. Manager Carr, of Shea's, had appropriate Universal moving pictures to celebrate the closing of the old year.

"David Copperfield" in moving pictures was a recent attraction at the Gordon Theater, Rochester. Kinemacolor pictures were also featured.

Recent features at the Colonial Theater, Rochester, were "Parsifal," "In the Clutch of the Paris Apaches" and "Phantomas."

F. J. Leonard is meeting with success as road representative of the Buffalo branch of the Victor Film Service. He covers western New York. P. A. Powers spent Christmas week in Buffalo.

The Buffalo Times recently had an interesting write-up of Joseph A. Schurchert, of this city, western New York and Pennsylvania manager of the General Film Corporation. About eight years ago he conducted the Buffalo Film Exchange, which was later absorbed by the General Corporation, of which he was appointed resident manager. The write-up says in part: "Success has attended his five years of continuous service with the popular supply house. He knows every phase of the moving picture game. He is a stickler for the clean motion picture, the play with the educational value devoid of sensationalism."

Manager Newman, of the Allendale Theater, recently featured these moving pictures, supplied by the Greater New York Film Co.: "The Enemy's Line," "The Open Door," "The Ancient Order of Good Fellows," and "The Parasite." Al Latz and his orchestra of five pieces supply excellent music for this house.

A. R. Sherry, of this city, will open the Hippodrome, Toronto, Ont., for the Shea Amusement Co., of Buffalo. Vaudeville and moving pictures will be featured. The house is one of the finest in Ontario and will seat 4,000 persons. Mr. Sherry was formerly employed by the Mark-Brock Theatrical Enterprises as manager of the New Lyric and Family theaters, Buffalo, and other houses. His Sunday moving picture programs at the Majestic Theater in this city will be looked after in his absence by Otto Schroepell, employed by the Mutual Film Corporation.

E. S. Davis is meeting with success as manager of Keith's moving picture theater, 261 Main street, Buffalo. His assistant is George Keating and the organist is George Kramer. This is the first moving picture house here to install an organ. The Keith instrument is noted for its beautiful tone. Mr. Davis was formerly assistant manager of the theater. In July he went to Elmira to change the policy of the Colonial Theater there from vaudeville to moving pictures. The change proved successful. Shortly afterward he took his present position. Keith's is owned by the Circle Theater Co. and uses General Film service. The patronage at the house was heavy during the past year. On New Year's day Mr. Davis featured "The Adventure of Kathlyn." A perfect system of ventilation has been introduced at the theater.

Work on the new Elmwood moving picture theater in Elmwood avenue, near Utica street, is progressing rapidly, and it is expected that the opening will be about March 15. The location is one of the finest in Buffalo and, judging from the interest taken by many Buffalonians in the enterprise, the Elmwood will draw a heavy business. This will be one of the finest houses in this city. Full descriptions will be given later. The owner is the Elmwood Theater Co., Inc., whose president is Frederick Ullman, a prominent lawyer of this city.

The old Congregational church in Niagara Square, Buffalo, has been abandoned for church service and might be turned into a moving picture theater. It is pointed out that it should make an ideal location for a moving picture show, as there is none in that section at the present time, and the church can be remodeled into a theater at a moderate cost.

Moving pictures showing the Albion, N. Y., fire department in active service was recently displayed to good advantage in that village. A popular feature was a scene depicting Chief of Police Andrew Vandell, of Albion, sending in the alarm to call out the department. The chief was seen running a considerable distance to the fire alarm box, when suddenly he tripped and fell with considerable force.

A branch of the George Kleine Attractions has been opened at 590 Ellicott Square, Buffalo, with Foster Moore as manager. His territory will be all of New York State, except Greater New York. Mr. Moore will book "Quo Vadis?" and "The Last Days of Pompeii" in legitimate theaters where these have not appeared and in moving picture theaters. "Quo Vadis?" is booked for the Star Theater, Buffalo, for four Sundays, beginning January 25. Dr. P. C. Cornell has successfully managed the Star, a Klaw & Erlanger house, for several years. Mr. Moore reports that he has booked "Antony & Cleopatra" for a week at the Majestic of this city, managed by John Laughlin. This production is being booked in other cities in the state by George Kleine's New York office, through Klaw & Erlanger. Mr. Moore spent several years as a successful press agent for legitimate plays. His last position in this line was with "Baby Mine," presented by the Dailey Theater caste. He handled the engagement of "Quo Vadis?" at the Majestic, Buffalo, last summer, and the pretentious offering and his notable press work combined to draw capacity business to that house. Mr. Moore looked after the same production in St. Louis, Indianapolis, Toledo, Columbus, Cincinnati, Louisville and Grand Rapids. He will announce later the release of other Kleine features.

The Harmonia Amusement Co. has sold the Family Theater, of Batavia, N. Y., to F. D. Miller, of Burlington, Vt. William Rosenthal, associated with the Mark-Brock Theatrical Enterprises, had charge of the sale.

A Canadian report says, in part: "Pending the adoption of revised rules for the censorship of moving picture films, a circular is being sent by R. C. Newman, Inspector of Moving Picture Theaters, advising Canadian chiefs of police that it will not be necessary to have the censor slip shown upon the screen. Tricks that have been played upon the Board of Censors, whereby unauthorized films have been shown as 'censored,' have influenced the Board of Censors to devise a new plan for marking films which will insure a guarantee of proper censorship and yet not mutilate the films. The new regulations will be issued shortly, and in the meantime a plain seal will denote that the film has passed the necessary inspection."

The Gayety Theater at Pearl and Huron streets, Buffalo, a new burlesque house, which will frequently show moving pictures, has opened under the management of J. M. Ward, who was formerly on the stage. Since his retirement he has managed theaters in New York, St. Louis, Cleveland and Chicago. He recently completed a term as leasing manager of the Broadway Theater in Detroit.

Henry Pullman, the dignified ticket taker at the Strand Moving Picture Theater in this city, was for years in the circus business. In 1881 and '82 he and his brother, Giles Pullman, conducted the Pullman Bros.' circus. His brother died in 1899. Before taking his present position Henry Pullman traveled with Campbell Bros.' show in the West. At various times he was with Walter L. Mains, Adam Forepaugh and John Robinson and covered every state in the Union. Mr. Pullman has given up circus life for good, but he still takes an interest in the business and is always willing to draw on a fund of good circus stories for the benefit of his friends.

The Hub Amusement Co. will build a moving picture theater in Main street, near Utica, Buffalo.

The Mitchel H. Mark, Palace Theater Co., will build a moving picture theater on the George E. Moore property in Main street, between North and South Division streets, Buffalo.

The All-States Amusement Co., with W. J. Kress, president, will build moving picture theaters in Buffalo and vicinity.

The Marlowe Moving Picture Theater in Virginia street is a beautiful, well conducted house and is attracting capacity business. First-run pictures are featured.

Manager Schlesinger, of the Academy, recently had charge of a party at which holiday gifts were distributed to local newsboys.

I. D. Fitson, on behalf of M. L. Cohen, manager of the Star moving picture theater, Lancaster, N. Y., recently appeared before the board of trustees of that place. He asked that the house be kept open on Sundays. He tried to convince the board that by closing moving picture theaters, money would be lost to Lancaster, because people would go to Depew and Buffalo and patronize theaters in those places. Mr. Fiston said the intention was to put on sacred and educational films on Sundays. The application for Sunday shows was denied.

NEW ENGLAND AND CANADA.

J. A. EMERY, manager of the Star Theater, Bar Harbor, Me., was forced to close his busy photoplay house in the week of December 24, because of a scarlet fever scare in town. Mr. Emery has opened the house again and is doing his customary good business. In addition to the Star Theater, Mr. Emery is busy with the Maine State Branch of the Exhibitors' League, of which he is secretary.

Contrary to the general announcement, the new Star Theater, Bangor, Me., did not open on December 24, for the simple reason that it was not possible to complete it in time. The house seats 1,500, and putting on the finishing touches proved anything but an easy task. A large force of workmen rushed the 1,500 odd seats in, but it took a long time to drill them into the concrete floor. The house opened on Christmas Day, with Mutual films, two singers and a six-piece orchestra. The Star is spacious and comfortable, as the seats are placed far apart, and give a perfect view of the screen from every part of the theater. The walls are light green and the ceiling is white. A modern system of ventilation is one of the features. Pope McKinnon, formerly owner of the Palace Theater, is the proprietor, and has secured as manager, Howard F. Atkinson, formerly in charge of the Nickel Theater, at Bangor. The entire 1,500 seats are on the ground floor, and good business is anticipated.

The annual banquet tendered by Toomey & Demara, and the T. D. Amusement Company, to their employees of the New Nickel, Premier and Broadway theaters, all of Lawrence, Mass., was held at Libby's Hall, on Christmas night. A very fine and long banquet was served, followed by an entertainment of varied nature, and the evening ended with a dance. The banquet was a huge success, and Messrs. Toomey & Demara are greatly pleased at having been able to give so much enjoyment to their loyal workers.

Messrs. Grant & Burns, of the Graphic Theater, at Bangor, Me., have repainted their theater and have also installed a daylight picture screen. This house finds business very good indeed, as does the Bijou Theater, which has added Kinemacolor pictures to its regular bills of vaudeville.

The Union Hill Theater, Gloucester, Mass., is now closed, but is is rumored it may be reopened under new management, before very long.

J. A. Eslow, manager of the New England Universal Film Exchange, Boston, reports that he lost about 75 reels of Universal pictures, which were burned in a fire on board the U. S. S. "Virginia," near Vera Cruz, Mexico. Manager Eslow not only does an ever increasing business in New England, but exports his program to several foreign countries.

F. G. Spencer's Lyric Theater, St. John, N. B., Canada, has been pulling pretty strongly of late with Independent service, and one act of vaudeville. The Unique Theater, of St. John, owned by the same gentleman, adheres to its strict policy of pictures only, and is proving the truth of the argument that pictures, after all, are the basic essential to success.

R. S. Cleveland, of Providence, R. I., a commercial moving picture operator, photographed the St. John, Can., fire department at interesting points of the city, the week of December 15.

The grand opening of the Plaza Theater, Salem, Mass., took place on December 31, at 1.30 P. M. The New Year's performance was run until 12.30 P. M. The house plays a policy of feature pictures, with a change of program on Monday, Wednesday and Friday. The show was continuous daily except Sunday, from 1.30 P. M. until 10.30 P. M. The price range was: Ladies and children, 5 cents, and men 10 cents until 5.30 P. M. From that hour until closing, the entire orchestra was 10 cents, while the balcony was reserved at 15 cents. The Plaza runs no vaudeville, and the stage has been so constructed as to eliminate any idea of acts at any time. Harry F. Campbell, president, and Samuel Grant, treasurer, of the Plaza Amusement Company, have great faith in the pulling powers of feature pictures, and use no vaudeville in any of the chain of houses operated by them. Warner's Features are the special subjects at the Grant and Campbell house, with general service to complete the program. The Plaza is entirely fireproof and modern and is one of the finest theaters in New England devoted to pictures exclusively. Invitations were sent for a special inspection and informal performance, to be held December 30, at 7.30 P. M. Every indication promises big business for the Plaza and J. O'Donnell has been selected as the resident manager, having been transferred from the Dreamland Theater, Lynn, Mass., which he formerly managed for Grant & Campbell. Sam Haase, formerly with the General Film, and Universal Exchanges, is now in charge of the Dreamland, and is employing his usual successful efforts there.

William Bradstreet, owner of a chain of moving picture theaters in this territory, intends to rebuild his Scenic Temple, Boston, at an expense of $50,000. The Scenic is an old church, in the residential district, and business has always been good.

A recent incorporation is the Smith & Perkins Company, of Brockton, Mass. The corporation is to engage in the making of lantern slides. Howard Smith, Henry L. Perkins and Fred J. Thompson, are the promoters, with $25,000 as capital stock.

The nominations of the Moving Picture Operators' Union, Boston, Local 182, were held on December 21, and disclosed many contests. Business Agent W. C. Franke, Financial Secretary Harry Danto, and Treasurer Thad. Barrows, are unopposed for re-election. The nominees for other places are: William Gilbert, Dwight C. Hutchings, William wheeler, for president; William Gilbert, Nathaniel Max and John Maloney, for vice-president: Charles Heath and John Williams for recording secretary. For the vacant place on the executive board, the following are candidates: Axel Birkholm, Charles Heath, Charles Hoehn, Israel Hookails, Edward Magann, Albert Moulton, Charles Parker, William Wheeler and John B. Williams. As the officers of the union are delegates to the Boston C. L. U., the local elects but one as such. For that place there are the following candidates: William Benolt, Joseph Cifne, Edwin Grant, Charles Heath, Frank Hookailo, Edward Magann, Nathaniel Max, Edward McCabe and Forest Parker. There is no lack of interest among the members of Local 182.

Beginning Monday, December 29, the Globe Theater, Boston, offers "The Traffic in Souls," with complete performances at 12.15, 2.15, 4.15, 6.15 and 8.15. Prices are 15 and 25 cents.

W. H. Patten, of the Mutual's Boston offices report brisk business and has no fault to find.

Manager Arthur Allen, of the Palace Theater, has now decided to use the exclusive Universal program in his Palace Theater at Bangor, Me. Mr Allen reports a steadily increasing trade, although the competition in Bangor is now very keen.

The Allen Theater, Calgary, Can., has been finding trade very good ever since it opened, November last. The Allen is the largest photoplay theater in Calgary, and uses a feature film service.

The Auditorium Theater, at Fitchburg, Mass., is now in the hands of Messrs. Salisbury & Soriero, who offer vaudeville and photoplay programs.

The Puritan Special Feature Company has sold its three-part feature, "Quincy Adams Sawyer," to Theodore Holman, Mansfield, Mass., for Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont.

The Consolidated Film Company, Ltd., Montreal, Canada, has purchased "The Secret of Adrianople," a four-part picture, made by Film Releases of America, and report very brisk demand for the feature.

Harry Asher, manager of the Famous Players Film Company of New England, leaves the bachelor ranks on Tuesday, January the thirteenth, to be married to Sarah Swarty. The ceremony will take place at Paul Revere Hall, Mechanics' Building, Boston.

Ed. Browne, of Gouldsboro, Maine, stated that his cozy photoplay house is doing very nicely, especially so since the Universal program has been installed.

The Scenic Theater, Damriscotta, Me., has switched its film service and is offering the Universal program.

On Monday night, December 15, Marcus Loew opened his new Yonge Street Theater, Toronto, Canada, and the reports state it was a gala occasion. Canadian officials and prominent people of Toronto were present. Marcus Loew himself was present, bringing a party of friends along from New York. The capacity of the theater was taxed to the limit, and many were unable to get seats. This house is said to represent a total outlay of about one million dollars, and is one of the most expensive and largest theaters in Canada. Mr. Loew has now invaded the Canadian field, and expects to build theaters in many of the principal cities, including Montreal and Ottawa. No expense was spared on the theater, and all the latest kinks in theatrical construction were provided. The house was constructed under the supervision of Thomas Lamb, of New York. The lower part of the building holds the theater itself, seating nearly 2,000, devoted to the regulation Loew policy of vaudeville and pictures. The upper part of the building is called the "Garden," and seats about 1,000. The theater is richly decorated in blue and gold, and is very artistic. Among those present at the opening performance were: A. L. Erlanger, Lee Shubert, Weber & Fields, Irving Berlin, Nicholas M. Schenck, general manager of the Loew theaters, and Joseph Schenck, manager of the Loew vaudeville agency. Mr. Loew closed the evening with a banquet at the American Club for his guests. The orchestra boxes were filled with the Government House Party. The Younge street theater bids fair to be a typical Loew success.

After being closed for a short while, the Colle Theater, at Greenfield, Mass., is again open, with S. Killeher in charge. Vaudeville and photoplays are offered.

The new Owl Theater, Lowell, Mass., a 1,200-seat moving picture house is due for an early opening.

The merchants of Milford, Mass., during Christmas week, gave their customers a coupon, good for one admission to any of the theaters, provided the purchase amounted to $5.

Manager Charles L. Benson, of the Premier Theater, Fall River, Mass., used "David Copperfield" last week, and the feature made good.

Manager Scates, of the General Film Company's Boston offices, has taken over a number of new houses lately.

Manager Thompson has switched his photoplay house at Milton, Me,, over to the Universal program, and states he likes the new service very much.

Manager I. M. Mosher, of Keith's Theater, Portland, Me., finds trade good, with pictures and vaudeville. A new idea was the sale of Christmas Gift Books, containing 20 orchestra tickets for the evening, or 25 tickets for the matinees, good all season. These books were in demand as Christmas presents.

"Quo Vadis?" the Kleine version, was the attraction at the Park Theater, Bridgeport, Conn., December 22-24.

The Lyric Theater, Bridgeport, Conn., has been very carefully redecorated and generally renovated by its new owner, Mr. Isham. The house is now one of the most up-to-date in Bridgeport, devoted exclusively to feature pictures. A new idea was used in the projection of the pictures—the stage was set to represent a woodland scene, the screen having been placed back of stage, gives it the appearance of being stretched between two oak trees. The orchestra is now seated on the stage, but is partly hidden by real shrubbery, in which are electric bulbs. Since its re-opening, the Lyric has done very well indeed.

P. H. Carroll opened his new North Theater, Waterbury, Conn., on New Year's Day. This house seats 1,200, and is absolutely a high-grade theater. It is devoted to photoplays only. Mr. Carroll anticipates a large run of trade for the North Theater.

"Les Miserables" was presented this week at the Francais Theater, Ottawa, Can. Manager Ken. E. Finlay was pleased with the results.

The West Stiner Company, of Winterport, Me., are now using the Universal program at their local theater.

Charles Lovenberg, manager of Keith's Theater, Providence, R, I., furnished a moving picture show for the children at the Municipal Christmas Tree Wednesday afternoon and evening, December 24. The entertainment was highly appreciated.

Early in January should see the opening of the New Brant Theater, Brantford, Can. The opening of this theater has been greatly held up, due to the tardy arrival of building material.

The employees of J. A. Eslow, manager of the New England Universal Film Exchange, Boston, surprised him on Christmas by the presentation of a complete smoker's set. Mr. Eslow states that he was greatly pleased with the thoughtful spirit that prompted the gift. All the employees were substantially "remembered" by General Manager Eslow.

On December 14, as these columns have stated, seven Boston photoplay theaters were allowed to open at 5 p. m,, instead of at 7 p. m., as is the usual Sunday custom. Since that time Mayor John F. Fitzgerald has withdrawn from the mayoralty contest, and will not be a candidate for re-election. On this account nothing more has happened on this matter, and all houses are back to the regulation opening hour. Mayor Fitzgerald was giving the 5 p. m. idea a trial, when illness made him decide to withdraw. Many complaints were made to the mayor's office with regard to the 5 o'clock opening from Puritanical folks. Cortlandt Meyers, a well known Tremont Temple preacher, wrote a particularly emphatic letter against the early opening, protesting with all the zeal of one ignorant of the true status of this industry. From all indications, Boston exhibitors will have to do a little educational work before the extra two hours on Sunday nights are permanent.

"David Garrick," a three-part photoplay feature, was shown at Loew's Orpheum Theater, Boston, this week. The Loew houses are now featuring special pictures.

At Tremont Temple, Boston, beginning Monday, December 29, the Pasquali production of "The Last Days of Pompeii" was started on its first Boston engagement.

The New Nickel Theater, Woonsocket, R. I., decided it required a change of film service, and the owners decided in favor of Universal pictures.

Manager McKey opened his new Broadway Theater, Somerville, Mass., on December 24, and played to really capacity trade. Mr. McKey is more than pleased with the outlook, and promises quality pictures only. The Universal program is exhibited at the Broadway.

The Universal's six-part production, "Traffic in Souls," is playing at the Globe Theater, Boston, to audiences that are unprecedented in size. The house is mobbed from noon until late in the evening, and hundreds are being turned away daily. This feature will run at the Globe for at least one month. Intense interest is being displayed by the audiences.

"What the Gods Decree," a four-part Eclair, is finding a very ready market with Manager H. Hirsch, of the World Special Films Corporation, 1074 Boylston street, Boston. Mr. Hirsch finds business very good, and is well satisfied with results attained thus far.

The Boston street commissioner's plans for the widening and extension of Avery street, and the widening of Washington and Mason streets at the junction of Avery street, met with some opposition on December 31, when the commissioners gave a public hearing upon the proposed improvement. Philip Rubenstein, representing the Pastime Theater, was one of the principal remonstrants. He objected because the widening will cut into the theater.

For the first time in the history of the town, the selectmen of Brookline, Mass., have decided to grant a license for a photoplay show. The more vigorous protests on the part of the clergymen and others were withdrawn, and the Brookline Friendly Society is now permitted to conduct a moving picture show two days a week. The first show was given last week and Gov.-elect David I. Walsh assisted at the "inauguration." The Friendly Society is a prominent philanthropic institution, and the selectmen departed from their long-established custom of issuing no licenses, when it was pointed out that this particular picture show is intended more for the benefit of boys and girls who take part in the activities of the Friendly Society than for the general public. The public, however, is also to have the privilege of attending the shows. The shows are to be given on the afternoon and evening of Friday and Saturday, each week, in Union Hall, Walnut street. Miss Mabel Stedman and Mrs. Henry Preston White are in charge of the enterprise, and it is the purpose of this organization to present a "model picture show, devoid of all objectionable features, yet of interest to persons of all ages, and appealing to a wide variety of tastes." Various changes at Union Hall were made necessary, to comply with the state law.

The Boston Central Labor Union Committee, appointed last week to attend all meetings of the Boston School Committee, and also to confer with its members regarding the employment of non-union moving picture operators at wage rates much below the prevailing ones, and other matters, went to the school committee rooms this week to attend the session, which its notification said was to be at 8 p. m. It was ascertained that the board, for important reasons, had met at five instead and concluded all its business. As it was learned that the school committee will hold another meeting next week, the Central Labor Union will attend then. Its members stated that, in an interview with Chief Whitney of the State Police, he told them that the Boston School Committee has no greater privileges than theater owners, or private individuals, and that if any laws are being violated, he would aid them in having them observed.

Theatrical Stage Employes' Boston Local has 275 members at present, as was stated at a meeting held this week. Various urgent matters, affecting the welfare of the union, and its membership, were discussed in executive session. The meeting donated $10 to assist the Gloucester, Mass., sailmakers.

Lou Vail, who operates the Scenic Theater, Warren, R. I., was in Boston this week on a business trip. Mr. Vail reports very fine business at the Scenic, and it is on this account that he is now erecting another photoplay house in Warren. The new house will be a modern, first-class theater, with a seating capacity of 621. Mr. Vail reports he has closed a contract calling for the full Universal program.

Frederic S. Elliott, treasurer of the Eastern Theaters' Company, with executive offices in the Kimball Building, Boston, announces "Dividend No. 1." This is a semi-annual dividend of 4 per cent. Harry F. Campbell is one of those responsible for the success of the Eastern Theaters' Company, which operates photoplay houses at Keene, Orange and elsewhere in New England.

Mrs. Viens, of the Viens Theater, New Bedford, Mass., has taken a three-year lease of the Opera House, at Lawrence, and started on January 4 with programs of Universal pictures and vaudeville. The Viens Theater has always been a winner and Mrs. Viens is expected to duplicate her good work at the Opera House.

On December 28, the Boston Sunday Herald gave freely of its space to tell about "Moving Pictures for making People Charitable." The reel in question was "How the Jews Care for Their Poor," as exploited by the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Federation of Jewish Charities.

Unless there is a change of plan, between now and the first of February, the Boston Theater, Boston, will probably become a moving picture house, when the present engagement of the "Whip" is over. The Boston is one of the largest theaters in the world, and all the famous stars, such as Booth, Mansfield, etc., have played there. The rent of the Boston is about $78,000, and successes have been rare these last few years. On this account, the present lease will not be renewed by the Frohman-Harris interests. The future of this famous old playhouse is largely in the hands of A. Paul Keith, as B. F. Keith owns the property. It is said that Mr. Keith, Jr., has stated "If they don't care to renew the lease, I think I'll put moving pictures in there." A stock company has also been considered by the Keiths. Another moving picture and vaudeville house to be called the Modern Theater, is being erected now, right alongside the Boston Theater, by the owners of the Beacon Theater, Boston. Whether this new 800-seat theater will have any affect on the Keith plans, is not yet known. More legitimate theaters are liable to fall into the hands of the moving picture men, as the writer learns that Frohman, Rich & Harris are still undecided as to whether or not they will renew their lease of the Park Theater, Boston, which is now nearly terminated. The Tremont Theater, another legitimate house, might also be thrown over as a $2 house. Moving picture interests are already interested in leasing these properties. Evidently the moving picture houses are doing better than the legitimate houses.

Several new theaters are under way now in Connecticut. There are under construction at Hartford, two new theaters, one for S. Z. Poli to seat 2,400, which will play the regulation Poli vaudeville and pictures, and the other a picture house. A theater is being built at Stamford, to seat 1,200, at a cost of $60,000. New Haven is scheduled for a new house, also.

Proprietor Duffy, of the Globe Theater, Pawtucket, R. I., opened his new Globe Theater at Attleboro, Mass., on January 1. The Attleboro house has about 550 seats, and is a first-class photoplay theater. Arthur Ward is manager of Mr. Duffy's enterprises. Universal pictures were contracted for by the new Globe Theater.

A disastrous panic was averted this week, during a $15,000 fire in the Manning Block, Washington street, Salem, Mass., when James Mayrakos, manager of the Comique Theater, Salem, Mass., which is located on the street floor, quietly requested the audience to leave the building. The composed bearing and the words of assurance of Mr. Mayrakos made it possible for the entire gathering to leave the building in good order. The last person reaching the street just as the flames burst through the door. The fire originated in the boiler-room about 6:30 p. m., and when it was first noticed, word was sent to Mr. Mayrakos, who mounted the stage, and explained the situation. The management aided the 700 people in the audience to file out in an orderly way, and is to be congratulated.

Wallace Gould, of the Pastime Theater, Brunswick, Me., states that he finds business very fair, and that he has switched his film service over to the Universal camp, having made arrangements with Manager Charles Stern, of the Universal's offices at Bangor, Me.

Burton Holmes is back again at Tremont Temple, Boston, with interesting pictures, showing scenes in the Philippines. "The New Manila" is the name of the lecture, which is drawing large audiences.

The Plaza Theater, Salem, Mass., formally opened to the public on December 31, with an overflowing crowd. Business has been absolute capacity ever since. This theater has a fine location in Essex street, and with a seating capacity of about 1,000 should do a big business. Its owners, the well-known and fast-growing firm of Grant & Campbell, have decided to use three-a-week Warner feature program, with General Film service to fill out the programs. The Plaza is a picture house and absolutely no vaudeville is to be used. The stage was so constructed as to eliminate any thought of vaudeville, as Grant & Campbell have little use for a mixed program. The theaters owned by this concern are prospering, without vaudeville in any guise. John O'Donnell is the resident manager, having been transferred from the Dreamland Theater, Lynn, a Grant & Campbell house. Sam Haase is now in charge of the Dreamland, which he is operating in his usual satisfactory way.

Among the bills favored by the American Federation of Labor in the Massachusetts Legislative session is one calling for license laws for moving picture operators.

Universal films are now being exploited by J. J. Hone, of the Opera House, Presque Isle, Maine.

The Opera House, Milford, Mass., has changed its policy from stock to Universal pictures and vaudeville.

On his return from New York, where he was called to attend a special executive meeting of the Universal Company this week, General Manager J. A. Eslow, of the Boston offices, stated that the main topic under fire was "what can we do to still further increase the exhibitors' business?" It was decided to immediately start work on additional feature productions, some of which are to be 4 reels: others 3, for which the demand is great.

Hugh O'Neill, manager of the Star Theater, Boston, is now buying his "juice" from Gordon & Lord's Olympia Theater, next door. The Olympia is also supplying electricity to the Howard Theater, nearby. The Gordon house buys its "juice" at a low figure, and is able to sell it at a saving to these houses.

A new feature film concern is the Allen Feature Film Company, with offices at 88 Boylston street, Boston. Among others it will book Florence Turner films to exhibitors in New England. Mr. Allen hails from Providence.

Manager Kay, of the Scenic Theater, Damariscotta, Me., is now using the full Universal program, which suits his patrons very much indeed. Business at the Scenic is good, so Mr. Kay reports.

A. Warner visited Toronto, Can., last week in the interests of Warner's Features. Exchanges are now being operated full blast in Toronto and Montreal, and Canadian exhibitors are taking very kindly to the Warner three-part features. As a result, an exchange is to be opened in Winnipeg to answer the demand of exhibitors in that territory for Warner's.

The Union Motion Picture Theater Corporation was started in Boston this week by Samuel V. Grand, Samuel H. Steinfeld and Frank H. Baer. The capital stock is $5,000, and the promoters are the same ones now operating the Novelty Feature Film Exchange, Boston.

The Kasino Company has incorporated at Lowell, Mass., with $5,000 capital. Edward T. Cushing and Charles E. Bunker are the officers of the concern.

Herbert Lubin, of the International Feature Film Corporation, Montreal, Can., has completed arrangements to handle the features of the Film Releases of America.

William Fox, owner of a chain of theaters, some of which are in New England, is now busily engaged with the details of his latest project, the Box Office Attraction Film Rental Company. Mr. Fox, acting through his manager, Abraham Carlos, has taken exclusive exhibitors' rights in New England (and New York) on the feature products of Ramo, Blache, Solax, Film Releases of America, Eclectic, Great Northern, Special and Preferred features. These makes are to be booked in the Fox theaters, and to any house desiring to use them. It is also understood that Mr. Fox will also exploit the features of several new European manufacturers.

Capt. Bauer, of the Massachusetts State Militia, has secured a Power's Cameragraph, No. 6A machine, and is now exhibiting in state armories and Massachusetts public schools, the pictures that were taken during the annual two weeks' encampment at South Framingham. These reels show every phase of camp life in the field and are exploited to stimulate interest in the State Militia.

Manager H. A. Chenoweth, of the Shawmut Theater, Boston, is doing his usual good business, with General Film service and vaudeville.

S. Arbach opened the new Owl Theater, Lowell, Mass., on December 25, and business of the capacity order greeted this new and modern theater. The opening attraction was "The Battle of Gettysburg," and Mr. Arbach intends to use features regularly.

The Jewell Theater, Lowell, Mass., has closed, in order to make extensive alterations and improvements. The seating capacity is to be enlarged to 1,000, and the house is to be made first-class in every way.

M. C. Blumenberg closed his new Portland Theater, Portland, Me., the week of December 29, in order that the extensive alterations and improvements might be made in the quickest possible time. A new ground floor lobby, marble ticket booth, and a new electrical display on the front are among the new things which Mr. Blumenberg ordered for his house. On January 5, the New Portland reopened, with a policy of three acts of high-grade vaudeville and five reels of pictures. Mr. Blumenberg knows his business from A to Z, and is bound to make a real success of this theater.

Moving pictures and vaudeville are doing very well for Mr. Thomas Logan, manager of the Majestic Theater, London, Conn.

The new Brant Theater, Brantford, Can., opened December 29, with a large program of pictures. This cosy theater is reported as getting a very satisfactory start.

Sam H. Trash reports that the new Geisha Theater now building at Springfield, Mass., is due for its opening on January 20. The location of the Geisha is on Bridge street. Mr. Trash will manage the house.

E. L. Knight, manager of the Bijou Theater, Springfield, Mass., brightened many hearts on Christmas day, by giving a free moving picture show to the inmates of the local Alms House. Mr. Knight had the entire moving picture outfit transferred to the Alms House to give the show.

Manager J. Loewer, of the Nelson Theater, Springfield, Mass., finds business good with his policy of vaudeville and photoplays. On Christmas day, Manager Loewer surprised his audience with a huge Christmas tree, laden with gifts, for his children patrons.

HENRY.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

OPPORTUNITY'S insistent clamoring has been heard by Manager W. W. Watts, of the Vaudette Theater, and for the first time Springfield photoplay patrons will have an opportunity to see the products of the Famous Players' Film Company.

The management of the Racine-Sattley plow factory in this city, which is greatly interested in decreasing accidents in industrial plants, found the moving picture film the most effective means possible of disseminating this gospel of "safety first." It held "open house" New Year's day at its plant here, and after the 10,000 visitors were shown the making of farm implements they were taken to a room where four recent pictures were exhibited. The films were "The Crime of Carelessness," "The Man He Might Have Been," "A Workingman's Lesson" and "An American in the Making."

The Grand Theater on the north side of the square has switched from General Film Company films to the Mutual service.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

LOUISVILLE.

IN spite of the fact that with Christmas Day came some of the most severe weather of the winter thus far, with lower temperatures than have been experienced in Louisville since last winter, and plenty of snow and cold rain, the business of the photoplay houses has continued splendid to the point of the phenomenal, in some cases. Saturdays and Sundays have been especially good, and the downtown houses have reaped liberal harvests in consequence.

L. J. Dittmar, who has for some time been the head and the controlling stockholder of the Majestic Amusement Company, operating the largest and handsomest house in Louisville, recently increased his holdings in that profitable enterprise by taking over those of A. P. Barnard, of New York, who is president of the Kinemacolor Company. A recent success at the Majestic was the Kalem production of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," which went remarkably well.

A unique departure for dancing instructors will be taken at Louisville's big hall, the Arcadia, shortly, as it is planned to use the three-reel Kalem film showing the details of the new dances, in order to aid beginners in grasping the somewhat difficult and complicated steps.

The Empire Theater had to be closed considerably ahead of the usual hour last Monday night, on account of a fire next door, which destroyed Sterman Brothers' dry goods store. Manager H. B. Strube discovered the blaze, after the odor of smoke had been noticeable in the theater for a time, and turned in the alarm. No damage was done to the picture house, and the audience filed out quietly, without alarm.

R. S. Shrader, manager of the Central Film Service Company's Louisville office, spent Christmas at his old home in Indianapolis.

S. E. Nestor, of Louisville, is organizing a company for the purpose of building and operating a new motion picture theater in the suburbs of Louisville. The exact location has not yet been determined, although Shelby and Rubel is regarded as a good point.

Recent feature hits at the Novelty, which gets the first-run of the Universal program in Louisville from the Central Film Service Company, were Warren Kerrigan, a local favorite, in the Victor three-part production, "Rory of the Bogs," and a two-part Imp, "Love or a Throne," featuring Leah Baird and William Shea.

Motion picture exhibitors all over Kentucky, but particularly those of Frankfort, are jubilant over the verdict of a jury in the county court in the capital city recently, which held E. K. Lyon, proprietor of the Grand motion picture theater, not guilty of violating the State law against Sabbath-breaking in operating his theater. Under the instructions of the court, the jury held the operation of a picture show to come within the legal definition of necessary labor, and accordingly acquitted Mr. Lyon. A case in the police court came up later on the same facts, and upon a fine of $25 being assessed, practically by agreement, the case was appealed to the circuit court, where it will be tried out on its merits. In the meantime, Frankfort picture shows will operate on Sunday. The councilman who started the agitation, has introduced an ordinance providing for an annual license fee of $350, and for a censorship board of three women, at salaries of $400 each, to pass upon the propriety of all films and songs. This ordinance has not yet been adopted, however, and seems likely not to be.

Hambaugh & Hambaugh, of Westport, Ky., have organized the Westport Amusement Company, and are operating a highly successful picture show in that town, taking the Universal service. The location of the town on the river gives an opportunity to draw audiences from the Indiana shore, and as the Hambaugh show is the only one in that section, it has a wide territory upon which to draw for its patrons.

Two complete outfits, recently sold by the Owl Film Feature Company, of Louisville, were to Elmer Mitchell, of English, Ind., and R. E. Stone, of French Branch, W. Va., both of whom have opened houses in their respective towns.

Thomas Barnett, Jr., an esteemed member of the staff of the Switow Amusement Company, under whose management the New Grand, of New Albany, was recently started on a successful career, and who has since visited over forty operating houses in Kentucky in search of new openings for the company, will shortly take charge of the Opera House at Madison, Ind., which is one of the largest properties controlled by the company. Besides a full film program, the house will present vaudeville to its patrons, giving way occasionally to traveling companies. This will give Mr. Barnett unusual opportunities for the display of his managerial ability, and he may be counted upon to make the most of them for the company.

H. U. Bradbury, well known in Louisville, who recently opened negotiations with a view to purchasing an interest in the Columbia Theater, has purchased a share in a house at Dayton, O., and is assisting actively in its management.

Picture show patrons in Hopkinsville, Ky., were recently much pleased with pictures of people and events around that city, including a good-roads meeting, several of the schools, crowds leaving the churches, and the departing audience at the Rex picture show, the management of which has had the pictures taken.

A party of motion picture photographers recently invaded the quiet precincts of Hodgenville, Ky., the town in which Lincoln was born, and took views of the town, the Lincoln statue and the Lincoln memorial building on the farm where the emancipator first saw the light. It is not known for whom the operators were acting in taking the pictures.

Among the liabilities of Charles Edward Dallam, a prominent business and society man of Henderson, Ky., who recently filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, was a note of $15,000 to the American National Bank of Louisville, which was secured by a first mortgage on the Columbia Theater, of Alliance, O., and the personal indorsement of R. H. Soaper, of Henderson. The value of the theater property is understood to be ample to cover the amount of the loan.

With a big vaudeville and motion picture program, the People's Theater, of Owensboro, Ky., recently opened, under the management of H. E. Mattingly. The moving picture program will be changed daily, and the vaudeville bill twice a week. A four-piece orchestra will furnish music.

E. E. Haggard, of Morehead, Ky., is in Washington taking steps to secure a patent on a device which he believes will revolutionize the manufacture of moving picture projecting machines. A factory is now operating at Morehead.

Manager Desberger, of the Star Theater, Paducah, Ky., has put on three vaudeville acts at his house, in addition to his regular moving picture program.

Motion picture exhibitors in Maysville, Ky., are among the most liberal advertisers of any in this part of the country, devoting more newspaper space to telling the public of coming picture attractions than does the average city theater, to advertisements. The Gem Beautiful, with Selig and Kalem pictures, and a good orchestra to draw business; the Washington, with Eclair and Vitagraph features, and the Pastime, with a 3-part Bison, "The She-Wolf," used two columns in a recent issue of one of the Maysville papers in telling about these things.

The contract has been let in Carlisle, Ky., for the construction of a new brick building, which will be occupied by the Lyric Theater and a number of business concerns. The contract price of the building is $11,786.96.

The Crescent Amusement Company, of Nashville, Tenn., which has a string of photoplay houses, recently took over the Lillian Theater, in Clarksville, Tenn., on a ten-year lease. Joe Goldberg recently opened the house.

The new Park Theater, at 4189 Hamilton avenue, Cincinnati, O., was opened recently by John J. Vogelpole, who is president of the company which built the house. Over 100 members of the Master Plumbers' Association, of which Mr. Vogelpole is a member, attended the opening performance. After the show the guests enjoyed a spread tendered by the plumber-exhibitor.

The Germania Theater Company has been organized in Dayton, O., by C. H. Briedenbach, Alexander Skilken, S. G. Kusworm, C. W. Dale and M. L. Ferneding, with a capital stock of $12,000. The company will establish a motion picture house.

Carpenter & Johnson, Louisville motion picture photographers, probably have the honor of being first in the field in a very interesting branch of the art. They recently completed a reel for a Louisville surgeon, showing all of the details of an operation for appendicitis, which will be used to illustrate lectures in a medical college, of which there are several in Louisville. The firm will make reels of other surgical subjects from time to time, and it is expected by the use of these reels, combined with the usual clinics and text books, to give the students a much more accurate and practical knowledge of their work than has ever been possible before.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

IN THE MIDDLE WEST.

MR. E. A. PETERSON, school medical chief, and Dr. S. H. Monson, school eye expert at Cleveland, Ohio, are said to have begun an investigation to determine the effect of moving pictures on the eye. President Ashmun, of the school board, is quoted as saying "that the prolonged use of the eye in gazing at moving pictures is bound to impair the vision." "There is no question that moving pictures harm the eyes," said Dr. Peterson. "The continued adjusting of the eye for motion pictures subjects it to strain." Dr. Clark Sloan, an optometrist of Cleveland, says that moving pictures will not harm a perfect eye, but adds, "Nine out of every ten have imperfect eyes and motion pictures harm imperfect eyes."

The World Special Films Company, of New York, has been granted a charter to do business in the state of Missouri, with offices at St. Louis. $10,000 of the $50,000 capital may be used in the state.

The Gwinn Club, of Gwinn, Mich., has decided to install a moving picture machine in its clubhouse.

F. P. Darcy, owner of a moving picture theater, who attempted to force the Sunday opening of theaters, in Kalamazoo, Mich., was recently a witness before the grand jury.

Miller and Powell, of Romeo, are said to be contemplating a moving picture show in Cairo, Mich.

Owners of photoplay houses in Pique, Ohio, have begun a movement to give shows on Sunday afternoons and evenings.

Dr. Levi Bird, a minister of Norway, Mich., and Joseph Bergeron, owner of the Palace Theater, a moving picture house, have been engaged in a battle over the question of Sunday opening. Bergeron opens his house every Sunday and papers are served on him every Monday. Twenty-one cases against him were thrown out. Two cases were tried by juries. In one case, no cause for action was found; in the other he was fined 8 cents.

The editor of the Omaha, Neb., World-Herald takes issue with Dr. W. J. H. Boetcker, who in a recent address in Omaha, decried the tendency of the laboring class to flock to moving picture theaters. After outlining the advantages of moving pictures, the editor declares that "until a substitute is found a practical substitute—they will continue to draw and entertain thousands and thousands, whose lives after all have entirely too little amusement."

E. M. Gilpin, licensed inspector at St. Joseph, Mo., proposed to change the tax on moving picture theaters, showing that the fee rate according to the capacity as follows: Seating 250 or less, $25; 250 to 400, $35; 400 to 800, $50; 800 to 1200, $65; on more than 1200, $75. He believes that this will be a fair license for the smaller theaters located in the suburbs, which seldom ever have a seating capacity of more than 250, and because they charge a dime admission are forced to pay the same as larger downtown theaters.

Detroit, Mich., residents neglected their churches on Sunday night for the motion picture shows, declared Rev. Thomas Sikes, of Grosse Point, in a recent address before the Detroit Pastors' union.

Moving pictures will be included for the first time in years in the programs at the five recreation centers in Milwaukee, Wis.

The Fotoplay Amusement Company, of Indianapolis, Ind., has filed notice of dissolution.

The Fourteenth Street Social Center, of Milwaukee, Wis., has adopted the use of educational moving pictures.

William Foley, of Hancock, Mich., has purchased an interest in the Crown Theater at Calumet, Mich.

Rev. D. M. Hazlett, pastor of Immanuel Presbyterian Church, St. Louis, Mo., recently used moving pictures in his services. One of the films shown was a rare picture taken in Shaw's Gardens November 11, 1912, showing three thousand chrysanthemums.

C. H. MacLaurin, of Gladstone, Mich., will conduct the Princess Theater, at Manistique, Mich.

The Garfield school of West Allis, Mich., is raising a fun to purchase a moving picture machine.

The Evansville, Ind., high school is raising a fund to purchase a motion picture machine. Principal E. P. Wiles believes that the time now devoted to chapel period could be used profitably for the exhibition of pictures. Some of the faculty wish to purchase pictures for the wall, but Mr. Wiles believes that the projecting purchase would be the most profitable.

Ellis Hoyt has purchased a moving picture show at Ponca, Neb.

The Casino Film Company, of Detroit, Mich., has changed its name to the Casino Feature Film Company.

The Garfield Moving Picture Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $5,000, to conduct picture shows. The incorporators are S. M. Davis, Edith A. Clouse, M. V. Emmerman, F. E. Rodd and Peter L. Daum.

The Misses Mary and Ella Wittwer, of Monticello, have purchased the Olympia Theater on University Avenue, in Madison, Wis., from Knut Johnson and Edward Sayre.

Daniel Johnson is now associated with R. O. Brady's moving picture theater, in Lawson Street, in Portsmouth, Ohio.

The first of the motion pictures to be used by the Conservation and Public Welfare Commission of Omaha, Neb., which was created by the last legislature of that state, have been shown. These cover the apple and beet sugar industries, better babies' contest, irrigation and the state fair. In addition, fifteen other subjects are being prepared for the camera.

The exhibitors of Youngstown, Ohio, have notified the civic committee of the Chamber of Commerce that they exhibit only censored films and are doing nothing contrary to the law. Furthermore, they declare that they are particularly interested in the matter of patronage of children, as this is almost a negligible quantity.

The Goodale Air Park Company has filed suit against the W. B. Thomas Company at Columbus, Ohio, alleging that a balance of $1,391 is due on an open air moving picture theater at Goodale and Front Streets, purchased by the Thomas Company.

A. T. Ackerman, of Knob Knoster, has opened a picture show in the Opera House at Leeton, Mo. This is his third show.

Adams & Snuggs are remodeling the building at 233 East Main Street, in Jackson, Mich., to be used as a picture show.

The Missouri state officials who are in charge of the exhibit by that state at the Panama-Pacific exposition have decided to join the ranks of the states who will do a good deal of their exploitation with moving pictures. A theater where the films will be projected will form a part of the state building.

T. F. Chantler, an efficiency expert, recently predicted before the Adcraft Club, of Detroit, Mich., that the moving picture shows soon would be the source from which the people would receive their daily news.

The Peerless Amusement Company, of Milwaukee, Wis., has filed a suit for an injunction against Frederick Geiger and his wife, Bertha, of that city, asking that they be restrained from blocking the exits of the moving picture theater at Center and Holton street, owned by the Amusement Company. It is alleged that after the Peerless Company had purchased land from the Geigers and erected upon it a photoplay theater, the defendants blocked the alley in both directions by erecting board fences.

C. P. Fuller, of Dunkirk, Ind., will open a moving picture show in Alexandria, Ind.

The Third Degree

The interest centered on this great Charles Klein drama during its whole season's run at the Hudson Theatre, N. Y., and its subsequent triumphal tour of the entire United States was indeed sufficient recommendation for its transfer to the films. It comes to you with two years of international advertising back of it, with public demand already created.

Aside from this advantage, the Third Degree will stand alone, strictly on its merits as a motion picture. It tells an intensely dramatic story of the inside workings of a metropolitan police department and holds its audience in eager suspense from start to finish of its 5 unpadded reels. A Lubin triumph in photographic production and a house packer in any neighborhood.

Thor, Lord of the Jungle

Selig—3 Reels. The most daring animal picture ever attempted. A story of adventure in an American Circus and in the wilds of Africa. Expensively mounted and intelligently produced.

The Battle of Shiloh

A Lubin 4 Reel battle picture made on the very ground where the armies of Generals Grant and Johnston met in deadly combat. A tender love story intensified by the roll of the drum, the crack of the musket and the alarms of war.

No more realistic war scenes can be imagined than are contained in this great photoplay.

THE GREAT RIGIDITY

OF

Simplex

A Motion Picture machine—especially when hand driven—is subject to great vibration. Unless your machine has the stability to withstand this, the result is an unsteady picture no matter how perfect your projection.

With the SIMPLEX, perfection in results comes first. The projection is flickerless, the machine is far heavier than any other made; and the pedestal, weighing 130 lbs., gives an absolute solid foundation which successfully resists all vibration.

Careful attention to every detail and precision in construction have rendered

Presents

CONSTANCE CRAWLEY

and her company of players, including

ARTHUR MAUDE

in a series of great plays—CLASSIC, MODERN, COLONIAL—the Premiere production being Sir Walter Scott's Immortal Romance

"The Bride of Lammermoor"

in three reels, to be shipped from New York to all purchasers in United States and Canada, January 21st, 1914, to be followed by Maurice Maeterlinck's

"Mary Magdalene"

in three reels, to be shipped from New York to all purchasers in United States and Canada, February 4th, 1914.

Both productions declared unreservedly by all buyers in New York City to be the best American feature productions exhibited in America in months.

ADULATION AND CRITICISM

On the Stage:

CONSTANCE CRAWLEY'S art is only comparable to Sara Bernhardt, and bids fair to crown her as the greatest tragedienne the British or Continental stage has ever known.—London Times.

TEN THOUSAND people at the Greek Theatre last evening arose as a body to acclaim the greatest tragedienne and the greatest tragic actor America has seen in decades. CONSTANCE CRAWLEY and ARTHUR MAUDE are unquestionably the best.—San Francisco Examiner.

CONSTANCE CRAWLEY is one of the greatest actresses of the whole theatrical world. —New York Courier.

CONSTANCE CRAWLEY is one of the truest, subtlest artists who has graced the American stage for many a long year.—Chicago Record Herald.

ARTHUR MAUDE is a strong, vital, clean-cut actor with temperamental qualities and much executive skill.—Chicago Record Herald.

ARTHUR MAUDE'S voice is a mellow organ, his carriage is of rare grace, and his method one of great self-control.—St. Louis Mirror.

On the Screen:

CONSTANCE CRAWLEY plays Melisande with a romantic inspiration and intelligent capacity making for the perfection of the piece, while ARTHUR MAUDE, as Goland, gave a masterful characterization.—New York Dramatic Mirror.

One of the most beautiful and the most elegantly acted of present-day feature films is "Pelleas and Melisande." CONSTANCE CRAWLEY interprets the role of Melisande with great artistic and dramatic force, while ARTHUR MAUDE impersonates the unhappy Goland with singular strength. —New York Telegraph.

CONSTANCE CRAWLEY and ARTHUR MAUDE, the eminent English artists, played the leading roles with superb skill.—Moving Picture News.

Motherhood or Politics?

Hepworth 2 Parts

Fighting for Women's Rights causes a mother to part with her baby. Years later she wishes him back, and it is with great difficulty that the step-parents consent.

The Harper Mystery

Turner Films, Ltd. 3 Parts

A powerfully written detective drama with Florence Turner as the lady sleuth. The different ruses are well thought out.

How Is It Done? and Hawkeye Meets His Match

Hepworth Split Reel

The first is a series of sleight-of-hand tricks and their explanation. In the second Hawkeye meets his double and many amusing incidents take place.

Two Little Pals

Hepworth Single Reel Drama

A rich little girl makes friends with a poor girl and they become fast friends. This friendship is the means of bringing two long-parted sisters together.

Adrift on Life's Tide

Hepworth 2 Reel Drama

Two poor children—a boy and a girl—are parted in childhood. The girl grows up to be a well-bred young lady and by accident meets the boy.

The Vicar of Wakefield

Hepworth 4 Parts

Oliver Goldsmith's masterpiece, pictured amid beautiful scenery, with remarkable adherence to the original novel.

After Many Years

General Film Agency, Ltd. 3 Parts

The fascination of a young captain by a wealthy widow leads to the parting of the sweethearts. Years later rescues from the sea and a fire prove the means of bringing the two together.

The Younger Sister

Turner Films, Ltd. Single Reel Comedy

A sparkling single reel comedy with Miss Florence Turner at her best.

The Red Light

Hepworth Single Reel Drama

A railway drama of a strike and the attempt to wreck the mail train. After being attacked by the strikers, the hero saves the train by means of a blood-stained handkerchief.

Jean's Evidence

Turner Films, Ltd. 2 Parts

A sensational drama, in two reels, featuring Miss Florence Turner, in which the dog, Jean, plays the detective, saving the heroine's honor and disclosing the real thieves.

SELIG.

UNTO THE THIRD AND FOURTH GENERATION (Special—2 parts—Jan. 5).—John Smythe returns from war as a youth who has been seasoned by experience, vested with ambition and armed with a sword which has won him honors. His father is one of those merry old English squires, of the hard riding, hard drinking type, who lives in the open in the saddle, and when at home takes much to the flagon. His mother is a gentle woman, and abhors the night revels in the hall of their manor, but she has been overruled so long, that she has submitted to the disagreeable function that has become a bad habit. When the stalwart son returns, the jolly squire marks his approval of his triumphs with much wine. The poor mother interferes, but the squire declares that it will "put red blood in him like that of his ancestors." John soon meets up with blushing, budding Mary Wayne, their engagement is announced. A friendly rivalry springs up between John and his cousin, William Wayne. The latter strangely proves his superiority in archery and horse racing, but the former, as a soldier, pockets his pride like a natural gentleman, until a fatal evening, when heated in a drinking bout, high words are exchanged between the two youths —there is a quick passage of arms, William falls with a sword thrust through his heart and John Smythe goes out—a wanderer in the world, drifts far across the sea to the new world, leaving his stricken parents in the ancient home bereft.

William Smith, who has eliminated the "y" from his name, has been graduated with honors from a college, returning with trophies for physical prowess, in addition to scholastic degrees. His father and mother greet him proudly, and he is the college hero; and behind them is the inevitable girl to make the triangle. The younger set celebrate the local idol's victories on turf and field, and the high-living banker, Willis, follows the occasion with an invitation to drink. The young athlete with a system clean and strong, suddenly finds the taste of liquor most agreeable, and soon surrenders to the appetite. A shadow falls across the threshold of his happy home. His mother is stricken with a deathly distress over his weakness, but the young man with the hardihood of youth, boasts that, "all business men take a drink now and then without harm." His placid father is startled when he finds a hidden bottle in the boy's room. All at once a new danger comes as a stalking skeleton in that household. Then the mother explains her perturbation in a secret visit to the cob-webbed attic, where she opens an ancient chest and removes a sword rusted with the stain of tragedy that fell upon their house two centuries before. On the raised lid of the chest is carved: "Beware ye curse of ye cup an' ye sworde!" Now comes the son, and his mother tearfully points him the warning, but he laughs away her fears and carries the flagon and sword to his own room.

Fast following, comes a birthday dinner in honor of his return. The guests come and some of his fast friends insist that it can be no dinner without wine, and one has secretly provided liquor in plenty. The young man receives his friends in great pride, but his father has disappeared. He has found the liquor, yielded to the taste of wine and when they find him he is a besotted thing—a victim of the ancient, pursuing curse that has followed his house. At the sight, the guests are ashamed, aghast, and silently melt away, carrying with them a memory that burned like a scar. Time, however, effaces the cruelty of the blow, but the lesson tells. Will's soul is filled with repentance and abhorrence. He steals back to his room; breaks the sword and flagon—breaks the spell of the curse. His father is brought back to health and happiness is restored in the household in which the new mistress, the wife of the regenerated boy, becomes a goddess.

THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN NO. 2—THE TWO ORDEALS (Special—2 parts—Jan. 12).—Kathlyn quickly recovers from the curious sensation of being forced to occupy an unwelcome throne in compliance with the scheming councilors of a fanatical people. The high priest prepares to go on with the ceremony of marrying her to Umballah, who is the mainspring of all her troubles; but she conserves all her powers of resistance to this proceeding, and with the dominant force of the Anglo-Saxon, for the time cowes the superstitious brown men who hover about the throne. This causes a delay on their part, which she instantly takes advtage of and the Council of Three, coerced by public spirit, decide that she will be given a week in which to consent to the marriage. Thus ends the sentimental episode in the gorgeous festival of the Durbar. During this horrible week of respite for the captive queen, a high caste native, Ramabai, is charged with murder, and under the law, all his property reverts to the reigning sovereign, including even his wife. In this instance, the wife is a beautiful young person. Pundita, highly educated. Kathlyn at once frees the captive, as far as slavery is concerned; and Pundita, in gratitude, begs to remain with her until she learns the fate of her husband. When Kathlyn hears her story, she orders Ramabai brought before her and declares him innocent. He, in turn, craves permission to remain in the palace, as the queen's personal bodyguard. Thus Kathlyn, by fate and force, secures for her personal service, two powerful factors in her favor (who remain with her throughout this series of plays). During this trying period, while Kathlyn has all her wits working to thwart the connivance of the crafty people about her; Bruce, an American sportsman, happens upon the scene from the far interior, where he has been hunting big game, and at once becomes a hero in spite of himself.

Kathlyn still refusing the alliance with Umballah, the council has decreed that she must submit to two ordeals with wild animals. If she survives these, she will be permitted to occupy the throne like Elizabeth of old, as a maiden queen. Bruce, learning of her plight, has managed to communicate with her, and swears himself her life champion. Pundita communicates with Bruce the circumstances of the ordeals. In the first test Kathlyn is dragged to a leopard's trap, and lashed to the mainstay of the deadfall as a human bait to lure the spotted cat from the depths of the jungle. She is so secured that the heavy door will fall the moment the animal springs upon it. It would seem that there is no hope of escape. The faithful Pundita, however, has informed her that Bruce will not fail to appear at the proper moment. Now comes the stealthy leopard closer and closer to the trap. At the last moment there is a flash, but it is not the form of the leopard hurtling through the air, but Bruce. Even as the heavy door falls, the famished, frenzied cat is clawing at it, trying to break through. Bruce fires at the animal through the bars and it limps back to the jungle, broken from his fire. While Kathlyn has escaped from the beast by a seeming marvel, for the second time she refuses the request of the Council, to marry the villainous man that dominates them. She is ordered to an amphitheatre, where the populace assemble to witness her fate as the refractory leader of their community. Bruce, now more wonderfully resourceful than ever in Kathlyn's interest, appears before the high priest and the Council and tells them that a miracle will save the Queen from the jaws of the savage lions, but if they compel her to submit to such a cruel ordeal, the same force will destroy many of the people assembled to witness her death. The impressionable people shrink at this idea; but stern Umballah mocks at him and orders him driven out.

That same night we see Bruce and Ramabai meet at the house of a high caste native. Ramabai is the leader of a band of high minded conspirators, whose object is to uplift the people and secure better government. They lead Bruce to a secluded place where are hidden land-mines, which have been smuggled by Revolutionists into Allaha, in view of impending military troubles. These mines, with electrical appliances for operation, are loaded on elephants, and then, under cover of night, the little band enter the silent and deserted arena of the amphitheatre, bury the mines, and connect them with wires leading to a box on the lower amphitheatre. The great day comes. The hungry lions are shown in their dens; the populace crowd in the stalls; and then comes Kathlyn, the beautiful captive, regal even in her simple robes of white, who is led into the arena. She walks to the far end, and stands under a canopy designed as a resting place for athletes between their feats. Umballah and his Council are in the royal box. The keeper opens the door, and the famished lions rush into the arena. They see the shining human mark; they crouch their lean, sinewy bodies for the fatal spring. The scene flashes back to the shadowy box where Bruce is manipulating the push-down of a blasting machine. As he establishes the connection, there is a rush—a roar—and the volcano of earth and stone bursts in the arena, leaving in its litter a great gash between Kathlyn and the savage lions. The spectators flee in panic, leaving many dead and wounded. Bruce leaps down from his box into the arena and seizes Kathlyn in his arms, as the scene dims.

THE LIVING WAGE (Jan. 6).—An investigating board learns from a factory girl that the average weekly wage is $4.00, and summons the reputed owner, Albert Dorn, before them. Gertrude Mason, an heiress, and her fiancé, Stanley Sneed, attend the session out of curiosity, and hear the chief witness, Letty Green's testimony; also Dorn's sworn statement that his profit is only 7 per cent on the capital invested. The young woman of wealth is deeply affected by the revelations of the factory system and strangely enough, her fiancé, unknown to her, is a silent partner in this very establishment; in fact, he sneaks off to the factory after the trial and congratulates the manager on his clever testimony.

This young woman of grit determines to play factory girl herself and ascertain conditions. She secures first, a position in the office of Dorn, and then overhears a conversation between that cruel taskmaster, and the man to whom she is engaged. She finds in his desk a secret ledger showing profits of over 35 per cent, and devolves a plan to get possession of this book. In the interim, poor Letty, who has been driven from pillar to post, becomes the victim of a "masher." He is fined a trifling $5.00 for his offense and then set free to prey again. Gertrude secures the assistance of Letty—they build a fake fire in the office and get away with the secret ledger. The result is that both men are summoned before the investigating board and properly dealt with. Gertrude also takes a hand herself and deals with her fiancé in a way that rids decent society of his offensive presence.

BY UNSEEN HAND (Jan. 7).—Arthur Baxter comes to spend the week end with John Masterson, a wealthy merchant. With him are his nephew, Jack Warrington, and his niece, Margaret Warrington. Arthur is in love with Margaret; she repels his advances, but he persists. Her uncle, however, rather favors the match, as he thinks Baxter is wealthy. Jack Warington, however, takes a different view of the matter and is badly worsted in a fist fight. He goes out hunting, and when he returns, later, he finds Baxter asleep in the library; so he quietly slips in and lays his revolver and cartridge belt on the table. He leaves the room, and some time thereafter a shot is heard—Baxter is found dead in the chair; the police investigate and arrest Jack.

Jimmy Norton, a keen police reporter, and friend of Margaret, refuses to believe that Jack is guilty. He discovers by accident, that the sun shining through a glass gold-fish bowl, has focused on a cartridge in the belt that Jack laid upon the table, exploded the shell and caused Baxter's death. The judge and the jury immediately clear young Warrington, and Norton's interest in her brother's case inspires Margaret to give him the answer he has waited for so patiently and long.

PIETRO, THE PIANIST (Jan. 8).—Pietro, a noted pianist, calls on wealthy Miss Hobbs, and makes such a hit that Percy, her sweetheart, is relegated to a back seat; so he departs in anger, registering vengeance upon the handsome Italian. When Pietro becomes engrossed in the practice of a soulful selection, Percy employs a German street-band to serenade the Hobbs home, to the great distress of the temperamental visitor, Pietro. Finally, by threats and bribes, the "tooters" are driven away. Then Percy hires a "hurdy-gurdy" that does its worst to disconcert him, so that Pietro is almost thrown into hysterics. This noise-maker is bribed away; then Percy plays his last card —with a woman organ-grinder and a diminutive monkey. This is too much for the temperamental Pietro. He, himself, rushes out to drive the woman and monkey away, when the woman throws her arms about him, and declares he is her long lost husband. This as a particularly happy hit for Percy. He finds out that she was deserted in Italy, and has made a fruitless search in America, and the monkey was really a business partner of Pietro.

Meanwhile, poor Miss Hobbs is torn by her emotions and Pietro again seeks sanctuary in her home. Percy turns the monkey loose that leaps through an open window and takes affectionate possession of its former master. This is the final blow and appears to cinch the evidence on the pianist; so that he is dismissed from the Hobbs home. Percy wins the young lady for his persistency and ingenuity.

ON THE BREAST OF THE TIDE (Jan. 9).—Big Jim Huntley lives in a cabin on a rock-bound coast, with his pretty wife, Jennie, and their darling daughter, Vera. Ideal happiness would be theirs, were it not for the fact that Jim is addicted to strong drink. He cannot keep away from the village grogshop o' nights, a weakness most distressing to his gentle wife. Finally her situation grows so unbearable that she orders him to leave and never to return until he has made a man of himself. Shocked into second thought, he resolves to maroon himself on a little island until he has conquered the demon, rum. There, alone, he fights it out, smashes his last flask of whiskey, and once again feels that he is master of himself.

Little Vera is playing in a boat which breaks adrift, and she is carried to sea by the tide, which sweeps by the little island, where her father is the sole inhabitant. The boat strikes a reef, capsizes, and she is about to be drowned, when Jim swims to her rescue. When he finds that he has saved his own little child, his thankfulness is so great, that he is positive no temptation can ever sway him from the duties at his own fireside. So he returns on the breast of the tide with his own little one clasped in his arms—a sober and a changed man.

ANGEL PARADISE (Jan 13).—Lonesome Linthicum and Bill Jernigan, a pair of cowboys, have been up all night, playing the tiger in an Arizona saloon. Ordinarily firm friends, they are now irritable from loss of sleep and too much drink, and have drawn guns over some trivial matter. A tragedy seems imminent when a little baby girl appears upon the scene. The other men of the room have taken to their hands and knees on the floor, and are hiding behind tables and chairs, waiting for the expected fusillade. When the child breaks upon the scene she thinks they are playing "I spy." She calls up all the big men and the two fighters sink into chairs in wonderment. She soon has all the big sobered ones playing "London Bridge is falling down." They stand her upon the chair and give her lemonade. Suddenly her father rushes in, and is greatly alarmed at seeing his child surrounded by these rough-looking men. It appears that her parents are traveling for the mother's health, and the little one had wandered away. One of the big miners lifts the baby on his shoulder and then the procession forms as the cowboys fall into line and take her to the mother. The Eastern family drive away to the train, and the little girl has the satisfaction of having averted a tragedy, as the two fighting cowboys, now sobered and softened by the influence of innocent childhood, are shaking hands.

CONSCIENCE AND THE TEMPTRESS (Jan. 14).—John Morton, a rising young business man, comes under the fascinating spell of Vera Violetta, a burlesque actress, and lavishes costly gifts upon her. His infatuation soon becomes subject for invidious remark, and a fellow employee of his company, writes to Morton's mother that her son is trembling on the verge of ruin, because of the evil influence of this adventuress. The grief-stricken old lady comes at once to the city from the little village where she has lived sa long, to see if she can break up this unholy attachment.

Mme. Violetta has played her trump card and induced John Morton to sign a $5,000 check in her favor. The next day she takes her automobile and speeds to the bank to cash the paper. Her chauffeur runs down and injures an old lady, but Mme. Violetta is good-hearted and takes her in the machine, rushing her to her own apartment, where she nurses her back to life. When the old lady regains consciousness and strength, she tells the woman of the mission that has brought her to the city. Unscrupulous as she is, the adventuress is immeasurably moved and her better nature is aroused. She rushes into her own room and there, in a dissolve, is shown the vision of her own innocent childhood, her blooming gorlhood, and then the lonely grave where reposes the dust of her broken-hearted mother. She tears up the check to save Morton from disgrace, and leaves him a note severing their union. When he calls on his inamorata, he finds her gone and his mother waiting with forgiveness such as only a mother can give.

BLUE BLOOD AND RED (Jan. 15).—Since the days of Joan of Arc, fighting blood has not been confined to the sterner sex, and when danger has called dauntless women have been found at the fore in line with sons and husbands. Two women are involved in this silent playlet, Helen Masters, of the West, and Mrs. Henry Raymond, of the East; the one radiant with rampant red blood; the other cool and aristocratic to her finger tips. The West, rough and uncouth, had filled her with dread; but when she and Raymond appeared in the mining camp, Helen, unsophisticated in matters of the heart, merely looked and loved. So fast follows a tale. The woman of the mountains seemed to see in this man from the far East, her ideal, and her whole nature cried out against fate, which had mated him with a "weakling." Raymond himself observed with dismay his wife's trepidation, her observance of petty things, and grew troubled by reason of her childish acts. In some similar measure his admiration grew for the self-dependent, strong and reliant Helen.

Then danger came, and with it an alarm. Raymond, cornered and alone, fought for his life, and both the women of Fate's combine heard the call. One might have thought the response would have been single. Helen, aroused, seized her ready gun to fly to the aid of the man she loved—the red blood surging in her veins inspired vigorous action; but this time blue blood flew quickly to the emergency. The aristocrat became the dominant factor as of old, and rushing to the front, wrested the gun from Helen, went straight on into the bullet-swept zone of danger, and kneeling low over the man she loved, held the enemy at bay until Helen arrived with aid. When Raymond was nursed back to life, his love revived for the woman who had emerged from the shell of artificiality, and honest Helen recognized the justice of the proceeding by silently bowing to the inevitable.

A MESSAGE FROM ACROSS THE SEA (Jan. 16).—Two retired Norwegian sea captains, John Lund, and Peter Anderson, live in the little town of Bergen, way up in Norway. The one has a son; the other, a daughter. These two, John and Freda, appeal to their parents for permission to wed. Old Lund objects to his son marrying a girl of the village, as his ambition has been that his son should marry a wealthy girl living in a great city. Anderson, on his part, claims that no fisher-lad of Bergen is good enough for his daughter. Thus the old cronies become estranged. The young lovers, however, impetuously refusing to be denied, are secretly married and sail to America.

While youth is changing, old age continues bent and the enmity of the old captains appears to be intensified by their loneliness, which the flight of their children has brought about, and the lounging place by the great anchor down on the beach by the fish market, is shunned by them. John and Freda, in far-away Minnesota, prosper and eventually became the fond parents of a husky boy. An itinerant photographer visits their farm and makes a picture of the child. The ancient ones in Norway never respond to their letters, but the father and mother conclude to send a photo of the grandchild to the old men in Bergen, thinking that it may soften their hearts. These pictures are duly received and through some similar impulse, each grandpa with the picture goes down to the old trysting place and meet face to face, with the photos in their hands. The time, the place and the pictures quite overcome them, and they fall into each other's arms. At this point, a moving picture cameraman, who has been taking pictures of the fish market, by pure accident imprisons the scene of the old men, in his film. A year later, the moving picture, having girdled the earth, as a scene in Norway, is shown in the place where John and Freda live, and they and their child attend the entertainment to witness scenes of Norway; and when they recognize this reconciliation of their fathers, their joy starts a fair sized riot in the theater, and it results in their making a reconciling visit to the old home a year later with the heir to all their fortunes.

VITAGRAPH.

QUANTRELL'S SON (Jan. 19).—The famous guerilla chief, Quantrell, disowns his son five years before the opening of the Civil War, because he has married against his wishes. Five years later, Quantrell is the leader of a band of Confederate guerillas, while his son is a private on the Union side. Continued escapes exasperate the guerilla chief and he swears that the next time a prisoner gets away he will hold the guard responsible. The son receives word from his wife that the baby is not to live long and that she wants him to get a furlough and come home. He applies for one but it is denied him. Soon after this, he is captured by his father's men, escapes and although he is shot, gets away to his home. Old Quantrell, not knowing who the escaped Union soldier is, goes after the prisoner himself, saying that if he succeeds in bringing back the prisoner the guard must die for his carelessness.

The father traces the soldier to his home, finds out that he is his son, and after a struggle decides to make him a prisoner, even though his beautiful young wife pleads with him to spare her husband and his own son. Quantrell is turning to call in his men and tell them where the soldier is hiding, when he comes face to face with the baby in the crib, quickly placed before him by his son's young wife. His heart warms up when he sees the little infant. After kissing the baby and caressing it tenderly, he goes slowly out of the house. Riding away with his men he tells them that he did not find the fugitive. The mother and wife rejoices and goes to her husband in the next room, taking the baby with her. The young soldier's wound is not serious, and does not prevent him from taking part in their mutual happiness, while Old Quantrell rides away.

LOVE'S OLD DREAM (Jan. 21).—While Professor Simon Sweet, a wealthy bachelor, is superintending the unloading of his baggage in front of his cottage, he meets pretty Dolly. His interest in her is equalled by her interest in him. Miranda, Dolly's aunt, falls in love with the professor, and resolves to win him for herself. Dolly goes out for a walk and again sees the professor, who hastens to join her. Dolly invites him in. Miranda sees the professor, goes up to him and insists on manifesting her affectionate disposition, much to that learned young bachelor's discomfort. The professor takes Dolly for an automobile ride. Miranda invites herself along. Dolly has to sit with the chauffeur. The professor goes to sleep while Miranda makes love to him.

Miranda is thrown into a jealous rage when she sees Dolly and the professor out in the garden in the act of kissing. She swears vengeance. She goes to a shrewd lawyer and enlists his aid. He tells her to hide a camera in the parlor, to which a string will be attached, and, when the professor calls, to drop a coin on the floor, making him get on his knees to pick it up and then to pull the string to take his picture; she will then have the necessary evidence to sue him for breach of promise. The professor calls a few days later and just as he is down on his knees to pick up the coin, the cat on the window jumps on his back. Miranda falls back on the sofa as she pulls the string, frightened by the dog which scared the cat. When the picture is developed, it shows Miranda ungracefully falling over the sofa, and the evidence proves worthless. Dolly and the professor, in each other's arms, have a good laugh at poor Miranda.

ANNE OF THE GOLDEN HEART (Jan. 22).—Upon the death of his wife, George Blake, an attorney, leaves the East. He first places his pretty young daughter, Lucy, in a convent. After traveling for a few years from place to place, in an endeavor to find some location which he might be happy in, he settles in Lariat Hollow, a mining town. He soon falls in love with a woman of the dance hall named Anne. This incites the jealousy of Larkin, the political boss of the town. To break George Blake, Larkin nominates him for mayor, purposing to have him defeated. Anne suspects the plot and tries to influence Blake to refuse the nomination. But Blake has given his word to enter the contest and goes in to win.

Blake's daughter writes to her father that she wishes to remain in the convent and become a nun. The father gives his consent. Now with every Eastern tie severed, he asks Anne to marry him. She accepts, but says they will wait until after the election, fearing to ruin what political chances he might have by an alliance with a dance-hall woman. The election occurs and Larkin's confederates defeat Blake. On the night of the election, Lucy arrives unexpectedly from the convent, having decided that she has not the religious vocation after all. Blake, in his hour of trouble, is glad to have her with him. Anne wanders out alone through the autumn forest, living through her "Gethsemane." She returns to the cabin in which Blake lives and says to him: "Lucy, your daughter, has the first claim on you. You must take her back East, away from me to the surroundings in which she belongs." Anne takes the girl in her arms and kisses her, then she turns to Blake, and bidding him a last farewell, goes out into the forest alone.

THE PERPLEXED BRIDEGROOM (Jan. 23).—On board ship, setting out for Europe, Jack Demly with his pretty young bride, Lucy, discovers in a newspaper that his father, believing that he is eloping and is not yet married, has sent a detective after him to bring him back and prevent the wedding from taking place. The article states that the detective is on the steamer. In order to offset suspicions, Jack conspires with an older friend, who agrees to pretend to be Lucy's father. As neither Jack's nor his wife's real name is known on board, their ruse proves effective. The detective overhears Lucy calling Mr. Markins "father" and does not suspect that Jack, who does not seem to be acquainted with the girl, is her husband.

The bridegroom's troubles begin when Mr. Markins mischievously makes love to Lucy in order to have a joke on Jack, who cannot interfere; afraid to be seen talking to Lucy. His perplexity is doubled when the detective makes Lucy's acquaintance and tries to flirt with her. She encourages him, much to poor Jack's dislike and discomfort. The detective becomes very friendly. He tells her why he is on the ship and shows her a warrant which he is carrying for the immediate arrest of Jack and herself. She asks him to let her see the warrant more closely. She takes it in her hand and pretends to be very much interested in it as she leans far out over the rail which separates her from the sea. She lets go of the paper and it is carried away by a friendly breeze onto the tossing waves. She turns with a little gasp of fright and tells the detective what she has done. Just then Jack, who has been watching from a distance, comes up. Lucy takes him to one side and tells him of her trick. He laughs boisterously and when the detective approaches, demanding to know the cause of their merriment, Jack tells him. The detective good-naturedly admits his defeat and gladly accepts the proffered hand of friendship from Jack and his pretty wife.

HEARTS OF WOMEN (Special—2 parts—Jan. 24).—Though he loves his ward, Belle Gannon, George Dixon realizes that the disparity in their ages places her far beyond his reach. Belle, a pretty, attractive girl of twenty, is a butterfly by nature. She is attracted by Hoyt Westcott, cashier in her guardian's factory. Upon the marriage of his housekeeper, Dixon engages as companion and housekeeper, Mary Baker, the daughter of a drunken father, who uses her as the implement for his petty thievery. Mary is received graciously into the Dixon home. Her gratitude being awakened, she determines to live straight. When her father arrives, bent upon thievery, Mary will not let him in the house. He is discovered by Dixon, who kills him, while he himself is dangerously wounded. Belle, realizing that her guardian loves her, sacrifices herself and marries him. Mary remains with them as their housekeeper, although secretly in love with Dixon.

A year later, Belle resenting her husband's preoccupation in business, longs for the attentions she received before her marriage. She drifts into a flirtation with Hoyt, who, to pay his gambling debts, steals from the firm. Dixon becomes jealous of Hoyt. The cashier persuades Belle to elope with him. He takes the bank deposit and conceals it in his room. On the day aranged for the elopement the theft is discovered and Hoyt is accused. He tells Dixon that the money is concealed in his room. Mary, the housekeeper, hears of the trouble. Through her love for Dixon she decides to save Belle from disgrace. She goes to Hoyt's room where Belle is waiting for the cashier, to elope with him, and gets her out of the way before Dixon and his partners arrive, but Belle's presence in the room is known to Dixon through some gloves and a satchel which the girl forgot to take with her. When he accuses her of her falseness she confesses and accuses him of neglect. Dixon, realizing the difference in their ages, asks forgiveness and they are reconciled.

THE ETERNAL DUEL (Jan. 19).—Gen. Paco Modesto, commander of a large Federal barrack in Mexico, and Arturo Martinez, a wealthy Mexican resident of the same city, are secretly working for the cause of the revolution. Don Alfredo, a fiery young Mexican dandy, pays court to Martinez' pretty daughter, Juanita, but is coldly repulsed. Juanita favors Gen. Modesto as a lover. Alfredo, enraged over the result of his suit, challenges Modesto to a duel. They agree to meet the following morning. Alfredo stealthily follows Modesto to his office at the barracks and there, spying through the window, sees Modesto receive a letter from the insurrectoes and deliver a pouch of gold contributed by Martinez. The letter, which Modesto hides in a secret recess in the mantel, compromises both the general and Martinez. The two men fight their duel the following morning, Modesto using a revolver, Alfredo depending alone on the Mexican riata, or lariat. Modesto fires all five of his cartridges without harming the dodging Alfredo. The latter then lassoes Modesto and binds him to a tree trunk, arranging a dagger to a branch so that when the cord burns through it will fall and kill the general. Alfredo hurries to Modesto's office, gets the incriminating letter from its hiding place and goes to Martinnez' house. Martinez is not at home and Alfredo tells Juanita that he has killed Modesto and demands that she marry him or he will expose her father as an insurrecto. Through the intervention of nature (a wind in this case) the dagger, in its fall, fails to strike Modesto. Furthermore, it aids him to release himself. Rushing to Martinez' home, Modesto arrives in time to overpower the threatening Alfredo and destroy the dangerous letter. Juanita marries the general, whom she loves. Later the insurrectoes, having carried the city, Modesto, as the new revolutionary governor, sentences Alfredo to a long term in prison.

THE CARD OF MYSTERY (Jan. 20).—Through a card which two jokers have given him, an Italian gets into trouble. Unable to speak or read English, he thinks the card contains an address. Expecting to be directed, he hands the card to whomever he meets. To his surprise, each person who reads the card drops it, hands him their valuables and dash off yelling "police." What he considers good fortune, he learns is bad, for he is arrested and dragged to jail, where he is charged with highway robbery and is about to be thrown into a cell when an officer enters with the jokers, having overheard them boasting of their cleverness. The mystery of the card is explained, the valuables returned to the owners, the Italian set free and the boys are heavily fined.

MATCH-MAKING DADS (Jan. 20).—John Graham and Jim Sanders meet at the club and renew an acquaintance of college days. John learns that Jim has a son, Charles, and suggests a match between the son and his daughter, Mabel. Jim agrees, but Mabel and Charles resent a marriage of such cut and dried conditions. Mabel tells her father that she most certainly won't marry a man she has never seen, and Charles tells his father that he won't stand for a forced match. The two old men leave their children and meet to talk matters over, and the young folks write notes of farewell and prepare to leave. Mabel gets away safely and goes to a hotel; her father and a detective take up the search. Charles is less fortunate and has to skin out the back way and run. His father reads the note, sees his escape and follows. At the hotel Mabel is given a wrong suitcase and gets that of a male guest. She is so tickled with the pajamas that she decides to see how they look on her, inasmuch as her hair is short and curly. While she is thus attired Charles enters the window with little ceremony. Seeing what he thinks to be a boy, he makes himself at home, while his father stalks about outside trying to locate his hiding-place. Mabel's father enters the hotel and with the detective comes to the conclusion that a girl registered under an assumed name, Ethel Bellew, must be his daughter. This is further confirmed by the man who got her suitcase coming to the office and making a kick. Father recognizes his daughter's clothes and is quickly ushered up to her room. Mabel, hearing her father's voice, throws herself upon the chivalry of Charles and tells him that she is a girl, not a boy. Charles leaves her and walks into the arms of his father. Mabel's father is admitted and after explanations are made she is taken home. The next day Charles decides to look up the identity of his fair acquaintance. He reads the name Ethel Bellew and recalls an article in the morning paper referring to a lady "Raffles" known as Ethel Bellew. He shows the clerk and they decide that they must be one and the same. His romance is shattered, but when he meets Mabel on the street later and she tries to pass him without being recognized, he has her arrested. At the police station he swears to her identity, but is smiled at in view of the hotel register that the clerk brings. They decide to call up the number she gives and both fathers repair to the police station, where the identities are made clear. The old men quarrel and the children seeing the humorous side of it become interested in each other. Charles recalls to Mabel's mind what their parents wish and guests that they put it into operation. The quarrel between the old men is halted abruptly by Mabel slipping into Charles' arms.

THE MAN FROM THE WEST (Special—2 parts—Jan. 22).—Years before the story opens, a gentleman came out of the East and settled in New Mexico. No one knew who he was or from whence he came, except that he paid as he went, feared no man, and never told a lie. He was dubbed by all "A Gentleman of New Mexico" and was respected and loved by all law abiding citizens. He was a dead shot and a law unto himself.

Mr. Stillwell, president of the Queen mines, is visiting one of his camps, accompanied by his daughter, Rose, and her fiance, Percy. The fiance is in a nearby saloon purchasing cigarettes. A renegade, Mexican Joe, thinks to play a little trick on tenderfoot Percy, by compelling him to drink of the firewater served in these parts. The young man refuses and serious consequences are in the making when "The Gentleman of New Mexico" happens in and stops the proceeding, thereby saving the young man from meeting with fatal results. Rose, who is out in the hills, hears the shot, warns her father and the superintendent of the mine, and they hasten to the saloon. There Rose meets "The Gentleman" for the first time and they are mutually attracted. The renegade, seeing, recognizes the fact that the two are drawn, one to the other, sees an opportunity of not only securing ransom, but also revenge upon his enemy, the unknown. He gets some of his kind to assist him. They abduct Rose and take her to the mountains. "The Gentleman" hearing of the abduction, takes the trail. He rescues the girl from the renegade, but in turn is nearly shot to death. Finally overcoming the crooks, he returns to camp and turns the other prisoner over to the United States marshal. The superintendent of the mine has, in the interim, received a note from the hands of the president's daughter, Rose, to be delivered in person to "The Gentleman." He delivers it to the unknown, who reads it. A week later we find him back in Boston, the home of the girl. He calls, sends in his card in reply to her note, which simply said, "Please come to Boston and get your hat," referring to a Mexican sombrero which he had presented to her because she admired it. Rose's father secures the card and gives the "not at home" to the butler. "The Gentleman" understanding, breaks through the servants and enters the musicale which is in progress and tells her he will wait outside for five minutes only. Rose realizes her heart has gone out to him and she turns, defies the conventional scorn of her social set and leaves to the man and master the care of her future happiness.

THE MOTH (Jan. 23).—The Moth, a young butterfly sort of girl, has married an elderly-invalid, John Davidson, for his money. She then proceeds to enjoy her youth and opportunities to the utmost. While he stays home or goes to see one of his old cronies she romps off with her crowd of youthful admirers and girl friends. One night John, returning from a call on his old friend, Bill, is held up by thugs and in danger of being beaten to death when he is rescued by a stranger named Ebbetts. Young Wallace, who has been driving Jennie, John's wife, and a gay party on a joy ride, returning from the Davidson home sees the rescue and takes John home. Ebbetts goes on his way, not knowing whom he has saved. Jennie is genuinely sorry for John's new ailment, but shows only the solicitude of a daughter. Later she meets Ebbetts in the park and a clandestine romance commences. Ebbetts does not know but that Jennie is a single girl and she does everything to keep him in the dark about it.

Finally, he will not be put off any longer and demands that she marry him. She puts him off and hurries home. He follows and confronts her in her own home. She pleads and coaxes him to go, but it is too late. John has seen and overheard. He threatens to shoot Ebbetts. They recognize each other and Ebbetts explains that he thought Jennie an unmarried girl. John will not believe him and angrily tells him to go before he forgets that he saved his life. Ebbetts goes and John retires to his room brokenhearted. There a realization of his infirmities and age overwhelm him and he thinks Jennie would be happier with him out of the way and he registers an overdose of his medicine would clear the way for her. When Jennie goes to his room, confident that she can wheedle him back into forgiving her, she finds him seated in his big armchair, head forward on his breast, dead. At first she is horrified and frightened as she discovers that he must have purposely taken an overdose, then she remembers Ebbetts and realizes that she is free now to go to her lover. She hastens to him with the news, but he spurns her love and tells her to go back to her dead. Seeing there is no alternative she goes back, and completely realizing the great wrong she has done, she goes to his room and choking back her emotion, stands there looking at him: then she breaks down, sobbing, and falls upon her knees beside his silent figure. A faint gray figure seems to lean forward from the inert form of John and the shadowy hand falls caressingly on her bowed head.

THE BLINDED HEART (Jan. 24).—Fred Lester, a young farmer, has been married to Rose for about three years. Rose is some years younger than Fred, and is still a child in many respects. Her entire idea of life is to be tender and loving to Fred. Fred, fairly well educated, and a reader of books, loves Rose, but is dissatisfied with his life not finding in Rose the bright, mental companionship he thinks he desires above all else. There comes to the neighborhood for a rest, Florie, a butterfly of the city, pretty, a wearer of good clothes, with a smattering of knowledge of many things, enough to greatly impress one so inexperienced in real life as Fred. Florie meets Fred by chance, and to pass the time away draws him into what to her is an idle flirtation, but to him a serious affair. He is completely infatuated. Rose has from the first been aware of the affair between Fred and Florie, and her heart has almost broken in secret. She is bewildered and helpless. Her only clear thought is that, no matter what the cost to herself, she desires Fred to be happy, and determines that if that happiness is found with Florie and not with herself, Fred shall have it. Florie suddenly announces that she must return to the city. Fred is staggered by the idea. Up to this time he has given no serious thought to the matter, simply accepting daily the intoxicating delight of Florie's companionship without thought of the future. Now, the idea of life on the farm, alone with Rose, seems intolerable to him. He proposes to Florie that he go away with her. Florie readily agrees. Rose has overheard the arrangement, but keeps silent. Fred secretly packs and conceals a suitcase. Rose discovers it and examines the contents with fond solicitude, finding, as she feared, that Fred's choice of clothing has been boyishly impractical. She repacks the suitcase, adding his winter underwear, placing with the garments a little note cautioning him to put on the wool if the weather grows damp or cold. That night she silently watches from a place of concealment when Fred steals away. Fred meets Florie at the railway station and together they discover the note. Fred is simply astonished and dazed. Florie instantly comprehends the whole situation, the sacrifice Rose has made, and how vital a passion must be the love which could conceive and execute it. Florie's real spirit, a kindly heart, of which she had never dreamed herself possessed, suddenly flares up in a fierce anger against Fred. In cold contempt she tells him to go back to beg forgiveness, and all his life thank God for the gift of so great a love. Humbled and repentant, Fred goes to find, with his now larger understanding, happiness.

GEORGE KLEINE.

WRECKED IN MID-AIR (Eclipse—Three parts—Jan. 27).—Morgan and Clarke, aeroplane manufacturers, are partners. Morgan, a much older man than Clarke and father of a charming daughter named Betty, leaves a good deal of the business to the junior partner, who is very ambitious and whose one aim is to make a fortune quickly. Finding money does not roll in fast enough to satisfy him, Clarke, wishing to get rid of his senior partner, conceives a plot to gain his ends. A contract has been given the firm to build an army aeroplane, and two workmen bribed by Clarke swear that they have received instructions from Morgan to send a duplicate of the most important part of the machinery to a foreign government. An inquiry is opened and Morgan is accused of treason; but their conscience awakened by the sight of their kind old master's plight and the grief of his daughter, the workmen confess and Clarke is unmasked. The latter quits the works with rage in his heart and a fierce desire for revenge. Several months pass. Clarke, at the head of a band of adventurers, seeks a fortune in the gold country. By a lucky chance he finds a quantity of hidden treasure, and again he determines to get even with his late partner. A great war race has been arranged, and Morgan has entered his latest model, which is to be piloted by Arizona Bill, his chief aviator, who is well known to the public and is the favorite for the race. The day arrives, but Morgan is confined to his house with a bad attack of gout. Betty drives off in her automobile alone to witness the start from the flying ground several miles distant. En route the girl is stopped by a band of horsemen sent by Clarke, who takes her prisoner and drives off with her in the car. Meanwhile Bill, high in the air, sees the car a mere speck in the distance, and being somewhat disappointed that neither his employer nor his pretty daughter has come to see his ascent, he wonders if they have been delayed and focuses his field glasses on the auto. To his astonishment he recognizes Betty struggling with her captors. Without hesitation he abandons the race to go to her assistance, but the desperadoes number four and advance upon him, pushing Betty in front of them, thus making it impossible for him to fire, force him to hand over his revolver and take him prisoner also, fastening his aeroplane to the back of the car and towing the machine along. Clarke's satisfaction may be imagined. A double capture! and all chance of winning the aeroplane race spoiled. Meanwhile Morgan is in despair. Betty has disappeared and no news has been received of Arizona Bill since he started off on the famous race. Everyone believes that the daring aviator has fallen into the sea and perished. Bill, however, is not the man to confess himself beaten. One night, seizing his chance while his guard sleeps, he quietly forces his way under the tent flap and soon finds his aeroplane, which is intact, only needing oil. Thus he soon sets the machinery in motion and the aeroplane rises into the air. But the noise has roused the camp and Clarke and his men are soon in pursuit. A bomb is thrown at the aeroplane and sets fire to the huge wings, and with terrible speed the huge bird falls useless to the ground. Betty and Bill are taken from among the debris, both terribly injured, and carried back to captivity.

Some weeks later the prisoners having recovered from their injuries, Clarke fears they may again escape him, and a thought comes to him. He has them carried into one of the disused mines and the opening closed up with stone and earth. But Bill is favored by fortune and by chance he finds some kegs of explosives left by the miners. The two prisoners arrange the powder, set a trail, and soon a terrific explosion occurs just beneath Clarke's encampment, the miserable man meeting a well-deserved fate in company with his accomplices. Betty and Bill, free once more, catch two of the horses which escaped death and are soon galloping toward home. Mr. Morgan can scarcely believe his eyes when the lost ones enter. An enthusiastic welcome is accorded the intrepid Bill, and he and Betty, having discovered their mutual love, exchange their first kiss.

Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

INSECTS THAT MIMIC (Jan. 20).—Few persons have ever had the patience and scientific knowledge to view the common insects of the woods and fields with such an observant eye as these nature pictures reveal. Here we see a caterpillar that mimics a leaf bud even to the extent of hiding its tell-tale legs to complete the illusion. Pale green in color, it defies the sharp-eyed birds that are its enemies, safe in its inconspicuousness. A giant weevil is also shown that, like the opossum, mimics death when annoyed. Other insects pictured are the "leaf-winged locusts," whose wings closely simulate the leaves of the plants upon which they feed; the strange "walking sticks" looking like twigs and therefore defying detection and the "Walking Leaf" of Malaysia, the most astonishing of all, every joint of whose limbs, the veins of the wings, the body, everything combining to give a remarkable representation of a leaf.

SUBMARINE MYSTERIES (Jan. 20).—The submarine world is inhabited by thousands of creatures little known even to science. Here we see strange creatures with stranger names, the spirographis, the cucumaria, which looks like a cucumber, and different kinds of jellyfish. Also the larvae of an eel and the eggs of a dogfish.

THREE PAIRS AND A CAT (Jan. 21).—Mr. Schmidt is disturbed in his much needed slumbers by a prolonged caterwauling in the yard. Tortured beyond endurance he throws his shoe, which contains one of his wife's stockings, at the cat. The shoe goes through the window of the house across the yard and receives the dazed attention of Mr. Nightlife returning home from a gay party

JUST PLAIN COMMON SENSE tells you—When you want to SEE yourself you use a Mirror. Because you SEE yourself better with a Mirror than any other means in the world. Now the same thing applies. When you want to SEE motion pictures, use a MIRROR SCREEN. Because you SEE the pictures so much plainer, better and clearer on a Mirror Screen than on any other surface under the sun. Besides it tickles your patrons and makes picture fans. It's a fact. The difference between a motion picture on a MIRROR SCREEN and any other screen of any other kind is the same comparison between seeing your own reflection in a fine French plate glass mirror and in a mud puddle. The "MIRROR SCREEN" is a Mirror. A magnificent mirror made from the finest polished plate glass that the world can produce. Get Right and Write to us to-day for our new Snow White Prismized Finished Surface. Eastern Representative, Frank Manning, 121 W. 48th Street, New York City; 52 South 10th Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

...ain't the case. He pockets the stocking, where it is later found by his wife. Her jealousy and suspicions are immediately aroused.

In the meantime a man and woman have been found kissing and are pursued by the police. Slippery Sue climbs up the fire escape of the Nightlife apartment and hides in the closet of their bedroom. How the crooks, the Schmidts and the Nightlifes finally meet in the courtroom is the amusing end to an interesting comedy.

AT HOME WITH THE HERON (Jan. 21).—One of those nature studies that will interest every one. The heron is found in practically all countries and these views show the nests, the young birds, their feeding and family life.

THE SWORD OF DAMOCLES (Special—2 parts—Jan. 22).—Hodgson with really remarkable musical talent can get no chance to be recognized to show what he can do. His character lacking the strength needed to balance his genius he becomes discouraged and becomes addicted to drink. His only sympathy he finds in his neighbor, Ella Marvin, who unites a big heart with a splendid voice. Hodgson has written an opera called "The Sword of Damocles," which he knows is a masterpiece and which is dearer to him than his life. Though his heart is thoroughly devoted to Ella, when he finds her one day with his precious manuscript in her hand, singing from it; made forgetful by liquor he plainly shows his anger and wounds her to the quick. This breaks their friendship and the repentant man leaves his quarters for good and becomes a drink-crazed outcast.

Winston, who has written some very clever compositions, has been commissioned by the directors of the opera to write them another, to be presented in the near future. He submits one, which is rejected. He tries to spur himself to a better effort, but his mind refuses to travel out of the channels of his past productions. Samuelson writes him that people are beginning to say that he has "run out" and he sees that his rising fame may become blighted in the bud. At this juncture he accidentally meets Hodgson, now a homeless wanderer, but still treasuring the precious manuscript. He befriends him with the food he needs and by chance sees the manuscript and recognizes its value. Plying Hodgson with drink he finally persuades him to seal the manuscript and relinquish all rights of co-authorship. He submits the opera to the directors and it is joyfully accepted.

In the meantime Winston has met Ella, became impressed with her and has persuaded Samuelson to give her a chance. Her talents win for her the leading part in the new opera. Critics and producers alike are delighted with the new opera at the dress rehearsal. Winston sees ahead fame beyond any he has ever enjoyed. But the sword of fate is hanging by a thread. Hodgson appears and claims he was defrauded of the opera. Winston attempts to lock him up in his cellar, but the desperate man escapes, appears at the opening performance to assert his rights and Winston dies by his own hand.

GOD'S WARNING (Jan. 24).—Robert Darmont, while staying at Chamonix, meets Marion Eddy and soon learns to love her. His love being reciprocated they become engaged. Their peace of mind is disturbed, however, by a letter that Darmont receives from his wealthy aunt, whose heir he is. She tells him that she has met some delightful people, a Mrs. de Lansay and her daughter, Gabrielle, and that her heart is set on his marrying Gabrielle. Darmont writes his aunt that he is already engaged, but that to please his aunt he will visit her as she requests. Gabrielle and her mother are really adventuresses and desire to get their hands on Robert's money to free themselves from debt.

Robert visits his aunt and meets the de Lansays and while he finds Gabrielle charming, his heart is really true to his fiancee. To entangle him Gabrielle plans a mountain climbing party. When her plans have succeeded and she and Robert are alone on the mountains she pretends to be injured and when he comes to her assistance so works upon him with her wiles that he momentarily forgets himself and succumbs to her charms. However, on returning to the hotel, he accidentally comes into possession of a letter to Mrs. de Lansay, which convincingly shows that the marriage of her daughter to him was coldly plotted in order to obtain money and at once informs his aunt. Thus the plans of the de Lansays are set at naught.

Robert returns to Chamonix and marries Marion. While they are on the honeymoon Gabrielle seeks revenge by obtaining a position as stenographer with Mr. Eddy and sets out to capture him by her wiles. He falls in love with her and proposes marriage, which she accepts. Robert and his wife return to find in Marion's father's fiancee the exposed adventuress. Robert endeavors to persuade her to give up the old man, but she refuses and only when a terrible fall in the mountains has brought her almost to her death does she repent of her designs and breaks the engagement.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 1, 1914 (Jan. 1).—Paris, France.—In excavating on the Boulevard Saint Marcel, workmen unearth a sarcophagus containing the remains of a thirteen-year-old boy believed to have been interred over 500 years ago.

New York, N. Y.—A feature of the biggest Christmas Eve party this city has ever given is the seventy-foot Christmas three in City Hall Park. A musical program by the New York police band and prominent singing societies is preceded by the illumination of the tree with 2,500 gaily colored lights by Mayor Kline.

London, England.—Queen Victoria of Spain, accompanied by the Duchess San Carlos, arrives from Paris to visit her mother, Princess Henry of Battenberg, at Kensington Palace.

Galveston, Texas.—The U. S. Transport "Kilpatrick" leaves for New York with the 2d U. S. Cavalry, en route for Fort Allen, Vermont. These troopers have been on border service for some time and exchange position with the 10th U. S. Cavalry (colored), which recently arrived on the same transport.

Hermosillo, Mexico.—The Constitutional mounted infantry maneuvers near this city in preparation for active service against the Federal forces.

New York, N. Y.—The poor of the city receive the good things of life for their Christmas dinner through charitably inclined associations and individuals. Congressman George W. Loft gives 1,500 baskets containing turkey and fixings enough for ten persons, to the needy on the East Side.

Varsovie, Russia.—An express train disregarding the signals, telescopes a train on the same track at the cost of a number of lives.

Comic Section.—Jeff sure was going some. Drawn by Bud Fisher.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 2, 1914 (Jan. 5).—Bridgeport, Conn.—The latest addition to the United States torpedo boat flotilla is the submarine G 3 (Turbot), launched at the Lake Torpedo Boat Yards. This is the first moving picture ever taken of the launching of a submarine in the United States.

Austin, Texas—Blind boys and girls of the State institution for the deaf, dumb and blind, pass in review before Governor O. B. Colquitt.

St. Louis, Mo.—Local fans witness the most exciting game of soccer football ever played in this city when the Knights of Columbus team is defeated by the Toronto Professionals, the undisputed champions of Canada.

Montreal, Canada—A break in an intake pipe at the reservoir places this city in the throes of a water famine. All efforts to obtain a needful supply for family use prove futile and the city would be at the mercy of a conflagration.

San Francisco, Cal.—President Moore, of the Panama-Pacific Exposition, which will celebrate the union of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans through the Panama canal, arrives to supervise the work already accomplished.

Glacier National Park, Mont.—Tom Dawson, forty years a resident of Glacier National Park, the famous guide, trapper and Indian hunter, successfully climbs White Calf Peak. This is the first time the feat has been accomplished when the mountains were covered with snow and ice.

Washington, D. C.—Admiral George Dewey, president of the General Board of Strategy of the American Navy, as vigorous as when he commanded the squadron that destroyed the Spanish fleet in Manilla Harbor in 1898, celebrated his seventy-sixth birthday.

ESSANAY.

THE CONQUEROR (Jan. 20).—Bess abhors the sinfulness of her brothers, who are crooks of the worst kind, so one day, while they are planning some villainy, she takes some money which one of the brothers had placed on the table, leaves the house and disappears as if the earth had engulfed her. Bess goes to a distant part of the city, and rents a furnished room from a kindly faced old lady, resolved to start life anew in a different environment. She secures employment in a large shirt factory and by diligent attention to work, becomes forelady and assistant to Williams, the owner of the factory. Jack, the weakling, completely worn out by the life he has led, is in the last stages of tuberculosis, when he accidentally meets Bess, and through helping him, her other brother, Frank, finds out where she is employed, and going to Williams, her employer, plays the "worried brother" part and tells him how Bess took the money and ran away from home. Williams, who has become very fond of Bess, is horrified with the idea of her doing such a thing, and tells her to mend her ways and go home with her brother. Things look pretty badly for Bess, until her brother Jack appears on the scene, denounces his brother and turns him over to two detectives who are waiting outside for him. We leave Williams and Bess to plan their future happiness.

LOOKING FOR TROUBLE (Jan. 21).—Mr. Simp is subservient to all his wife does or says, and as his wife is a militant suffragette, Mr. Simp is a firm adherent to the cause. He receives a letter from Mr. Charles Trouble, telling him to meet that gentleman, as he would like to talk business with him. The excruciatingly funny incidents that develop out of his "looking for trouble," will keep an audience convulsed with laughter.

A NIGHT ON THE ROAD (Jan. 22).—A knight of the grip has many inconveniences to contend with, and not only that, but often his very life is in danger. Such is the case with John Duncan, a traveling man, who was obliged to remain over night at a small inn located in the far West. The hotel-keeper, an unscrupulous Italian, with the help of two ruffians, scheme to steal Duncan's money and do away with him. The manner in which Duncan, with the aid of Carmelita, the hotel-keeper's daughter, escapes from the clutches of the desperadoes is miraculous.

BRONCHO BILLY AND THE BAD MAN (Jan. 24).—To err is human. But in the end, goodness of heart will prevail and the one who has committed an offense against man-made laws may come out of the mire and develop into a law-abiding and god-fearing citizen. Broncho Billy, from being one of the most desperate characters in the West, is reformed through the kind treatment accorded him at the hands of the sheriff and his wife, and is made deputy.

THROUGH THE STORM (Special—2 parts—Jan. 23).—Andy Burton, a railway lineman, patrols an isolated section on his railway motor-car, watching the telegraph service of the company. He lives with his wife and their baby at Daly's Creek, a flag stop on his section, where there is no telegraph service. Susan's ambition is to become a telegraph operator and add to the family purse, and has petitioned the company to install an office at their station, Daly's Creek, and has been studying and practicing telegraphy at home with Andy. Her request to the company for position as operator, unknown to Andy, has been refused and Daly's Creek has been denied it's telegraph service. Coming home later one stormy night, Andy overhears tramps in the ravine plotting the blowing up of the trestle three miles below. One of the party has spotted Andy's car when he is arriving home late; the others are in the ravine lying in wait for Andy to pass, knowing then the road will be clear for them to get his car without his knowledge and to wreck the fast mail train. Andy overhears them planning, but is discovered by the tramp who has trailed him from the motor-car shanty, and who gives the alarm to the rest of the gang. They set upon Andy and leave him for dead. They take his motor-car and start for the trestle.

Andy revives in spite of his broken leg, drags himself through the storm which is raging, to his motor shanty, only to discover that they have taken his car. Andy instinctively searches the shack and finds a pair of pole climbers, a pair of pliers and drags himself out into the storm, climbs a telegraph pole, searches amongst the wires, finds the proper one, cuts same, then with an end of the wire in each hand, he telegraphs a message of alarm to the train dispatcher's office. By mere chance Andy's message is received in the dispatcher's office. The fast mail has been headed off and advised of its impending danger. A special train with officers, and a doctor to attend Andy's injuries, is sent from division headquarters via Daly's Creek and then on to the bridge. In the meantime the tramps have had motor trouble with the car, which delays them. The fast train has come within safe approach of the trestle, the train-men with their lamps hidden under their coats, go ahead on foot, to the trestle. The plotters are caught and their arrest is accomplished. The special drops off the doctor at Daly's Creek to attend to Andy, who having recovered, dragged himself to the platform. The men volunteer to stay with the doctor and help him with Andy, and the special moves on towards the bridge. As a reward for Andy's bravery, a committee of officials have come to his cottage and find him convalescing. His devoted wife is attending his wants. The superintendent orders the installation of telegraph service for Daly's Creek and makes Susan it's first telegraph operator and station agent for the company, and Andy is made the road's chief of the telegraph department for life.

KALEM.

TRAPPED (Special—2 parts—Jan. 19).—Nell, a thief and girl of the slums, resolves to lead a better life. The girl breaks away from Brent, a crook who has been her companion, and secures a position in a millinery store. Brent meets Nell on the street shortly afterward. He attempts to bully the girl back to her old life. Nell, in a frantic effort to escape, dashes across the street. An automobile knocks her down and injures her so seriously that she is taken to the hospital.

Lane, a young surgeon who is attending Nell, falls in love with the girl. Because of her past Nell refuses to marry him. Later, however, she reads that Brent has been sent to prison for a long term of years. Feeling sure that Lane will never learn of her former life, Nell finally agrees to be the surgeon's wife. Shortly after her marriage, the girl learns that Brent has escaped and is at large. That night, she hears burglars in the house. Terror-stricken, Nell, who is alone, is about to phone for the police when one of the burglars enters and holds her up. To her consternation, she faces Brent.

The crook leers at her in triumph. He brutally jeers at her and compels Nell to give him money. Brent leaves, but promises to call as soon as his pockets are empty. Lane returns home just as the thieves are leaving and is knocked unconscious. The police are notified and take up the trail. Shortly afterward, Brent, who needs money, follows Nell to the country where she and her husband have gone for the week-end. Bud, a second-story man, is with Brent.

The thieves learn that they are being followed. Holding up an automobile, they compel the chauffenr to speed up his machine. Nell and Lane are among the occupants of the car. The detectives take up the pursuit in another car. Bud is captured, but Brent escapes by boarding a speeding freight train. The crook hides himself in the water tank of the tender. Shortly afterward the train stops for water. Caught in the tank, Brent is drowned like a rat in a trap.

THE PALEFACE BRAVE (Special—2 parts—Jan. 21).—Colonel Peck, about to leave for the West with his wife and son, Paul, to take up a government grant, is presented with an engraved bowie knife by the former members of his troop. Paul, who is ten years old, kisses his little sweetheart, Martha, good-bye. Several weeks later, Pedro, a bandit, and his men descend upon Peck's camp and steal his horses and water. As a result the colonel and his wife perish with thirst. When Big Eagle and his tribe come upon the camp they find Paul the only survivor. At the sight of the redskins, the lad seizes his father's bowie knife and attempts to slash the Indian chief. Pleased at the lad's pluck, Big Eagle takes him back to his tribe, where the boy is adopted by an old squaw. Sixteen years later, Paul, now a full-fledged brave, is betrothed to Little Antelope, an Indian maid. Pedro, the bandit, has covered up his crimes and now poses as a respectable citizen.

Major Blake, a former friend of Peck, is ordered to take command of the post near Paul's tribe. His daughter, Martha, accompanies her father. Pedro sees the girl and falls in love with her. Martha spurns the man. The Mexican concocts a scheme which will make him a hero in her eyes. Several of his men capture the girl. Paul hears Martha's cries for help and goes to the rescue. He lays the bandits low. Pedro, who witnesses this, is furious and tries to kill the paleface brave, but is himself slain. Paul is seriously injured. Martha's father and several troopers come upon the scene. Paul is taken to the fort, where he is tenderly nursed by Martha. Paul's bowie knife leads to his identification by the major and his daughter. The girl falls in love with him. Little Antelope learns of her lover's injury. She arrives in time to see Martha bend over and kiss him. Furious, the Indian maid hurls the white girl across the room. Paul is ordered to choose between them. With a smile, he turns to his Indian bride and takes her in his arms.

AT LAST THEY EAT (Jan. 23).—Waddle and Weary arrive at a town, which unknown to them has been made tramp-proof. Hungry, they apply at one of the houses for a bite to eat. The lady of the house presses a button. The next moment, two hooks catch the tramps by the rear and toss them into the next yard. An attempt at another house results in their being drenched to the skin by an automatic tramp trap. Filled with trepidation, the hoboes climb the steps of a third house. This time their perseverance is rewarded. Each receives a suit of discarded clothes, but as they descend the steps, the latter suddenly straighten out and the hoboes slide to the bottom.

The hoboes accost a theatrical manager, but find that his show is bankrupt and that he is as hungry as they. The three concoct a scheme which promises to feed them. Weary is billed as a famous comedian, while Waddle spreads the news that his pal is a fakir and urges the villagers to attend the show well stocked with eggs, vegetables, etc. The people fill the theater that evening, and upon Weary's appearance pelt him with the stuff they have brought for that purpose. The curtain is immediately rung down. Immediately after, Weary, Waddle and the manager make a feast of the audience's contributions.

UNVEILING THE PILGRIM FATHER'S MONUMENT (Jan. 23).—Over in Southampton, England, there was recently unveiled a monument dedicated to the Pilgrim Fathers who left England in 1620 to come to America. This feature shows the ceremonies commemorating the event, and the part played by the American ambassador, Thomas Nelson Page, who unveiled the monument. Other interesting topical views show the golf match played by the English peeresses for the silver challenge cup; the Children's Regatta held on the Thames at Twickenham, and divers at work laying electric cables at the bottom of the Regent Canal.

EXPLOSIVE "D" (Jan. 24).—Alstyne, Col. Frasier's guest at Fort Brandon, is a foreign spy. The man witnesses a test which proves the terrific power of an explosive invented by Captain Morton. The spy determines to steal the formula, which is hidden in the colonel's desk. To further his ends, Alstyne makes violent love to Millie, Frasier's daughter. Fascinated by the man, Millie forgets her sweetheart, Morton. The young captain views the situation with apprehension.

Alstyne calls to take Millie out riding. As he enters the house, he sees Col. Frasier place the paper containing the formula in one of the desk drawers. Later, when the colonel leaves the room, the spy enters and steals the document. Millie enters the room just in time to witness the theft. She attempts to wrest the paper from Alstyne's grasp, but is hurled to one side. Alstyne dashes from the house. Mounting his horse, the man dashes toward a spot where an accomplice in a motor boat is waiting.

Millie gives the alarm, after which she mounts her own horse and goes in pursuit. The spy discovers he is being followed and fires several shots at the girl. None of them take effect, however. The girl overtakes Alstyne just as he reaches the edge of the cliff, at the bottom of which his accomplice waits for him. The spy is just about to shoot when his foot slips and he falls to the rocks below. Colonel Frasier, Morton and the troopers reach the cliff. Millie gazes below with horror. Morton makes his way to the silent form and finds the formula. Alstyne is dead. The captain returns the precious document to the colonel, after which he turns to his sweetheart. Throwing her arms about him, Millie sobs for forgiveness.

BIOGRAPH.

CONCENTRATION (Jan. 12).—The dead man's decentralized life is exemplified in a half-finished will and an incompleted invention of a printing press. The mother impresses upon her two sons the power of concentration by a magnifying glass held to the sun's rays. One accepts the lesson and finishes the work of the father. The other becomes the tool of the rival printer. His lesson was to come through experience and the suffering of others.

WAIFS (Jan. 17).—The waif came to live with the unsuspecting old shoemaker. Then a homeless newsboy followed. One friendly heart bred another. That was too much for the proud, wealthy widowed sister. She declared she would have no orphans wished on her. Stilling her conscience, she took the children's legacy, but one Sunday morning after the war, peace silenced all conflict.

OUT-BLACKED (Jan. 15).—The Black Four were a band of desperate kidnappers. They hit on Prunella, the daughter of Judge Meek, now long past the age of discretion, and desperately hungry for the society of the other sex. They found her a tartar and she proceeded to put them under the iron rule which had enslaved her father. He was now enjoying his first vacation for years, and refused to take Prunella back. Never did kidnappers suffer as these.

HOW THEY STRUCK OIL (Jan. 15).—A party of city folks is stranded on a country road, their automobile having become disabled. Several of the farm folks gather around them and become the object of the city folks' derision. Chance gives the farm folks a glorious opportunity to retaliate.

THE THIRD DEGREE (Five parts).—Howard Jefferies, Jr., and Robert Underwood are warm college chums, the latter, a boy of moderate circumstances has a penchant for art and devotes most of his spare time to the canvas, but Howard having a rich father is indifferent to the future and indulges in drink and other excesses. One night in a restaurant, a pretty waitress seeing that he is intoxicated, refuses to wait upon him; he insults her and is requested to leave. Next day he goes back to apologize and the two become friends and eventually get married. Howard's father, who for some years had been a widwer, marries again, the lady being an old friend and patron of Bob Underwood. Eventually the two boys leave college the young artist establishes a studio and quotes Mrs. Jefferies Sr.'s name as a patron to induce an advantage. The lady, however, withdraws her patronage and Underwood finds himself broke. On Howard informing his father of his marriage to a pretty waitress, the father turns him adrift and cuts off al allowance. Both Howard and Anne seek work, but find nothing but discouragement. Underwood not being able to borrow any more money from Howard, makes a last desperate appeal to the elder Mrs. Jefferies, informing her that he contemplates suicide. One night Howard much intoxicated enters Underwood's studio and lying down on the sofa falls asleep. Bob finds him and places a screen around the couch; shortly after Mrs. Jefferies Sr. enters. Not seeing Howard, she has an interview with Underwood and refuses him any monetary assistance or further influence and leaves, declaring their association at an end. Robert then enters his sleeping room and placing a revolver at his head, fires. His bell boy raises an alarm, the police arrive and find young Howard leaning over the dead man's body. He is placed under arrest and on the spot Captain Clinton in the presence of others, puts him through the third degree. The terrible ordeal lasts for hours until the boy hypnotized and overcome with fright and need of rest, confesses that he had killed his friend. Howard is thrown into jail and his father unrelenting not only refuses aid, but instructs his own lawyer that the boy is a murderer and he must suffer, also that if the eminent attorney takes the case, that he must not look for any more of the Jefferies' patronage. Aside from the false confession wrung from the boy, the only clue to the mystery is the fact that a woman visited the studio on the night of the tragedy. Howard's young wife after much endeavor induces Mr. Brewster, the corporation lawyer, to take the case in defiance of Jefferies' orders. At the trial Mr. Brewster introduces Dr. Bernstein, an expert on hypnotism, who rigorously confounded the police captain who

"Out of Darkness"

A three-part drama showing the self-sacrifice of a famous physician, who becomes terribly scarred in a laboratory explosion. His wife is blinded, but recovers her sight through an operation. He disappears, leaving evidence that he has been drowned. Their meeting in later years and the reunion form a beautiful story with a heart-gripping touch of pathos.

"The Burning Train"

A two-part circus story with many big scenes and ending with a runaway train on fire.

"Death's Door"

In two parts. A story of mother love, in which a woman risks her life to see her child. Her great devotion reconciles her to her husband and his haughty mother, who has separated the young couple.

"A Leap of Despair"

In four parts. Thrilling and sensational, with a big climax in which a daring equestrienne falls from dizzy heights with her horse. A wonderful subject.

had extorted the false confession. Both Mrs. Howard Jefferies, Sr., and Mrs. Howard, Jr., were at the trial and under the terrible pressure of the scene Mrs. Jefferies, Sr., produced the letter that Underwood had written to her, threatening suicide. The letter was simply addressed to Mrs. Howard Jefferies and to save the elder lady's good name, Annie, the young wife of Howard, claimed that the letter was sent to her and that it was she who visited the studio on the eventful night. The case was dismissed and Attorney Brewster, by his good offices, brought Howard's father to the young folks' humble lodging and effected a reconciliation and happiness for all.

THE LION AND THE MOUSE (Six parts).—John Burkett Ryder is a master of finance with a boundless desire for wealth. No mean avarice, but a love of the power to be gained through riches—a domineering will and an unscrupulous soul. Previous to the opening of the story Ryder has compassed the financial ruin and professional disgrace of Judge Rossmore, of the Supreme Court, to avenge himself for certain adverse decisions which the judge has rendered against the corporation. Shirley Rossmore, the judge's daughter, and young Jefferson Ryder returning from Europe on the same boat, have met and register a pretty story interest in each other, being at the time entirely ignorant of the friction now existing between their respected fathers.

Shirley has written a novel, and from Jefferson's description of his father has made the star character of the story a fair prototype of the master of finance. Ryder, without consulting his son's wishes, has already announced an engagement between Jefferson and the daughter of Senator Roberts. Shirley Rossmore's book which is written under the pseudonym of Sarah Green gets into Ryder's house and makes such an impression that the great financier employs a detective to find the author. Sarah Green is found and Ryder employs her to compile his biography, not dreaming that she is the daughter of the judge he has ruined.

Now comes the battle between the Lion and the Mouse. The Mouse wins the Lion's admiration by the outspoken audacity of her opinion of his life and moral code. Kate Roberts, whom Ryder had selected to be his son's fiancee, elopes with his aristocratic private secretary, "Fourth groom of the bed chamber to the second Prince of England." Ryder, to pacify his son and to offset his attachment for Shirley Rossmore, suggests that he marry Sarah Green, "who has proved herself far more brilliant than the judge's girl." It is then Shirley's turn; she declares her identity and admits that she has secured certain letters from Ryder's desk that will prove her father's innocence. Ryder orders her from the house; then he sits up all night, consumes innumerable black cigars and finally conquers his own vanity. Next day Jefferson Ryder proposes, but Shirley declares that she will never marry a man that has such a father. With bitter words, Jefferson denounces his father: he tells him that the girl he loves objects to the family. But John Burkett Ryder eats a big slice of humble pie; he announces that he will prevent the impeachment of Judge Rossmore and implores Shirley to accept his son. The Mouse has conquered the Lion.

THE BATTLE OF SHILOH (Four parts).—At the beginning of hostilities, Tom Winston, despite the pleadings of his sister, Ellen, who is an ardent Confederate, goes North, and acquires a commission in the Federal army. Frank Carey has entered the Confederate service, though his sister, Ethel, furiously denounces him as a traitor, and asserts her intention of herself serving the Union. Both girls become identified with the secret service department of the South and North, respectively. Tom is with Grant, and Frank with Johnston, and the movements of the armies bring them into the neighborhood of their homes. Tom has with him Don, a dog, which had been used in the old days to carry messages between his master and Ethel. Union headquarters are established in the Winston home, affording Ellen an opportunity to acquire many valuable secrets which she communicates to Frank, and it is the belief that some officer is proving a traitor. Tom watches his sister closely, and one night observes that as she sits merrily chatting with the Union officers, she is using her fan in such a manner as to make the dots and dashes of the Morse code to Frank, who is concealed in the shrubbery, making notes of the information. Tom discovers Frank and overpowers him, and succeeds in taking from him the memoranda, but allows him to escape. Tom places the memoranda in his pocket.

The Battle of Shiloh has begun and Tom is given an important despatch, ordering up supporting brigades. He proceeds on his mission, but is pursued and badly wounded. Unable to go on, Tom gives the despatch to Don, telling him to carry it to Ethel. Don does his part, and Ethel undertakes to deliver the order. She is hotly pursued by Confederate cavalry, and only escapes by jumping her horse from a cliff into the river, a deed which none of her pursuers will attempt. They do not fire upon her, but wave their hats and cheer as her horse swims the stream and climbs the other bank. The despatch is delivered, and the reinforcements begin a forced march to the assistance of the Federals.

Meanwhile, Tom has been picked up by a Federal party, unconscious, but not dangerously wounded. The memoranda taken from Frank is found in his pocket, and it is concluded that he is the supposed traitor. A drum-head court-martial condemns him to be shot. The battle is now raging fiercely, the victorious Confederates pressing steadily forward. The Federal position is carried. Tom is captured and sent to the Confederate rear, where he succeeds in eluding his guards. Despite the sentence hanging over him, he determines to rejoin his troops. Johnston is killed, the triumphant advance of the Confederates falters. Tom reaches the Union lines, he rallies a breaking regiment and leads a fierce charge. The tide of battle is turned, Frank is captured. The battle lulls, the Confederates sullenly withdraw from the field. Tom is immediately arrested and placed under guard. Frank learns of the fate in store for Tom, and to save him, confesses himself to be the spy. Tom is released. Frank is held as a spy, but cleverly effects his escape. Frank goes to his home to attempt to induce his sister to go South with him, as he must accompany the southern army further into the Confederacy. Tom has gone to see his sister, to endeavor to induce her to give up her dangerous work as a Confederate spy, and has been captured by a squad of Confederates while at his home. He sends a note to Ethel, informing her of his situation. Ethel secures several Federal troopers and makes her brother a prisoner. Under a white flag, Ethel and her squad approach the Winston home, and Ethel proposes an exchange of prisoners. This is agreed to, as well as a temporary truce; then Tom and Ethel turn to the North, while Frank and Ellen ride away into the Confederacy.

THE MAN WHO LIED (Two parts—Jan 19).—Jim Lewis, an honest young police officer, comes home of an evening with money that he has borrowed from a friend to send his sick sister away to a different climate. Before, however, he reaches his apartment, the pursuit of an escaping culprit attracts his attention—he joins in. He runs his man over buildings and finally corners him. It is his brother. After dropping what little money he did have on the gambling table, the brother had taken to theft to secure the money for his sister. Jim lets him go, telling his seniors that the man escaped. This is his first lie and he is dismissed from the service by the very friend who had loaned him the money.

Thinking to retrieve his honor, Jim goes, with his brother and sister, to the Northwest, and Jim joins the mounted police. McNulty, the plain clothes friend who loaned Jim the money, suspects that something is wrong and follows. When the brother catches sight of him he is staggered with fear and steals a horse and escapes into the hills.

Jim, unaware that his brother is the one who has stolen the horse, asks the officer for a chance to make good. The alarm is given and Jim is told to get his man. Jim accompanies the mounted and the U. S. officer into the hills and the thief is cornered in a hut. Jim approaches, and is shot. He closes in and then discovers that it is again his brother.

"I've lost my reputation through you, but you will not take my chance to retrieve it," Jim cries. However, the brother pleads that he be spared for his sister's sake, and Jim gives in. The brother is seen to leave the house and all give chase except Jim. The brother escapes. The officers, returning, find Jim upon the ground—dead of his wounds.

The brother returns to his sister and—anyway he was always her favorite of the two.

A DANGEROUS EXPERIMENT (Two parts—Jan. 23).—An undersized student has a rival in the school athlete for the love of a girl. The student, interested in the occult, brings about a transition of souls, that is to say, he transfers his soul into the body of the athlete and forces the athlete's soul into his own. After the completion of the experiment the student is unable to change back. When the athlete finds himself locked up in the puny body of the student his anguish is awful. His football companions, who formerly looked up to him as their peerless leader, now laugh in derision at his piteous attempts to tell them who he really is. The student, when self-endowed with the athlete's body, and finding it impossible to get back, smashes in blind rage the crystal which he used in making the exchange.

The student previously believed that if he only had a fine physical frame he would have more chance in the loved one's affections. His father, returning from India, brings with him a wise old Hindu swami, who, finding that the boy is interested in the things that interest him, gives him some of his secrets. It is through this uncanny knowledge that the student, in a hypnotic seance, exchanges his body for that of the athlete's.

The plot, however, does not work out as desired, for the girl transfers her affections to what appears to be the student. She does not know why this is, but the student, now in the athlete's body, realizes that after all it is not the outward appearance of the man that attracts her, but the real man himself. He therefore tries to get back, but finds it impossible. In the nick of time the swami reappears and repairs the damage wrought by the dangerous experiment.

FRONTIER.

SLIM AND THE INDIANS (Jan. 22).—A young eastern girl arrives at the ranch and sets the boys agog with her beauty. In order to gain her favor, Slim attempts to make himself out a hero, which he does by bullying an inoffensive Indian. Molly, jealous, discovers Slim's attempt to appear brave and later overhears the plans by which he hopes to win the fair easterner. Slim invites the city girl to go for a buggy ride and arranges with the cowboys to disguise themselves as Indians and attack them, so that he may glorify himself by saving the fair damsel. The boys disguise themselves and are about to fulfill Slim's plans when Molly, by a clever ruse, compels them to remove the paint and feathers and remain at home.

Angry at the insult previously offered to him, Big Brave hurries to his people and incites them to war. They capture Slim and his lady fair and take them to their village. In the meantime, a [illegible] spreads the alarm and Molly and the cowboys, now scared, start out to the rescue. The cowboys rout the Indians. At Molly's instigation, the boys again don their Indian war paint and give Slim the alternative of marrying a squaw or being burnt at the stake. Slim decides to burn. Just at the moment when things are becoming serious for Slim, he learns of the joke. Big Bill has, in the meantime, "copped" the city girl, and Slim goes back to his first love. But she also spurns him.

ABIDE WITH ME (Jan. 24).—Martha is the daughter of Quaker parents, newly arrived in the West. Her father and mother are wrapped up in their religion, and Martha is denied the various little enjoyments of life. The reading of novels, for instance, is to them a sin. What little pleasure Martha has is derived from playing and singing on the old family organ, particularly, "Abide With Me," her parents' favorite hymn. By an accident she meets Harvey Gilmore, young, handsome and wealthy. The two fall in love, elope, and are married. But their efforts to obtain a reconciliation with Martha's parents are in vain.

Time passes. A thief breaks into the Quaker home and steals the bank which for years has been used for their missionary savings. That same night the thief enters the Gilmore home, is detected and captured. The box falls from under his coat and Martha recognizes it. The day following the loss is discovered. The father leaves to notify the sheriff. Martha and Harvey arrive. The mother is finally persuaded to forgive them. The father returns—apparently as obdurate as ever. The bank is returned to him; but still he refuses to recognize them. Martha sits down at the old organ, and softly begins playing "Abide With Me." The old man is touched and relents.

REX.

THE MUD BATH ELOPEMENT (Jan. 22).—Bob Hart loves and is beloved by Betty, daughter of a wealthy business man. However, the father has more ambitious plans for his daughter than allowing her to marry Hart. The father frowns upon Hart's suit, while he encourages the suit of Lord Darby, a rich member of a decadent aristocracy. The father is gouty, and goes to Arrowhead, Hot Springs, with his daughter, Lord Darby, and a chaperon. Bob Hart follows and elopes with Betty while the gouty father is taking a mud bath. Lord Darby reports the proceeding to the father, who worms out of his mud bath, and gives chase. He comes upon the two lovers just after they have been married. Overtures of peace are finally made with success, when Bob consents to cleanse the father of mud. Bob takes a hose, and with a stream of ice water, showers the old man.

THE LEPER'S COAT (Jan. 25).—The wife chafes at life in her husband's sanitorium where she is ever exposed to infectious diseases. The friend is a bachelor. Fearing to enter the hot-bed of life-killing germs, he invites the physician and wife to his apartment for dinner. The physician is called away on a case and the wife is left alone with a friend. She confides to the friend her horror of life in the sanitorium. She breaks down and makes overtures to him, asking him to take her away. The friend refuses to listen. Shortly afterward the friend calls at the sanitorium to consult the physician about his health. The doctor tells him that he must dress warmer, and sends his wife upstairs for an overcoat. She is gone longer than might be expected, but presently returns with an overcoat. The friend puts it on and goes home. In his apartment he removes the coat and reads the name of the owner over the inside pocket. The name he reads is George Earl.

George Earl is a leper, who is being treated at the sanitorium. His case has been given wide publicity. A terrible fear that he is infected takes hold of the friend. His servants hear of it and flee from the house. In the meantime the wife realizes what she has done, and she weeps through the night. She sees the friend leave a note at the sanitorium. It is addressed to her husband. In it the friend says that he is going into the country and that if symptoms of the disease appear upon him he will return and kill the physician. The wife confesses her act to the physician, and he takes after the friend.

In the meantime, the friend's mind is all but overbalanced with fear. He becomes delirious and runs through the streets, telling the horrible secret to all that he is a leper. The friend comes to the house of a Christian Scientist. She takes him in, and, unafraid, cares for him. The physician finds him, and in order to quiet him, tells the friend that the coat was not the leper's, but that his wife simply wrote the name in it.

Time passes. The friend recovers and marries the Christian Scientist. The physician writes him, telling him that it was actually the leper's coat which he wore. The thought is expressed in the sub-title that science has proven that fear of disease will produce its symptoms more surely than contagion, and that thought governs the body.

JOKER.

HEAVEN WILL PROTECT THE WORKING GIRL (Jan. 24).—Little Nellie is a poor but honest working girl and no match for the unscrupulous Max, who is working for her downfall. In attempting to elude Max, Nellie is knocked down by an automobile, driven by Bob, her lover. Bob takes the girl into his machine. Unseen by Bob, Max climbs into the back seat of the machine and at an opportune moment, knocks Bob over the head and drives away with the defenseless girl. He takes her to a secluded spot, but his evil designs are as nought against her simplicity. With a well aimed blow she knocks the villain unconscious and escapes. Max recovers, hires two roughs to aid him, and pursues the girl to the place of her employment. He has her discharged and when she leaves the store he again captures her.

Bob, the youthful hero, traces Nellie and her abductors to a den of iniquity. There is a terrific fight and Bob is captured and tied to a tree. A dynamite bomb is lighted and placed a few feet from him. With a tremendous effort Bob tears up the tree by the roots and severs his bonds by means of the burning fuse. With the bomb he lights his cigarette and then hurls the explosive at the ruffians. He saves Nellie in the nick of time from the villainous Max. The defenseless girl then drags her savior to the nearest justice of the peace.

CRYSTAL.

JONES' BURGLAR TRAP (Jan 20).—Following a bad scare with a burglar, Jones installs his burglar trap, which is controlled by switch in his bedroom. When the switch is pulled a trap on the stairs opens and precipitates the standee in the cellar, where he is locked in. That night two burglars enter the house and Mrs. Jones pulls the switch. Down they go. A neighbor, observing the front door open, goes in to investigate and he falls in. Mr. Jones and a friend return home late and while the contraption is being explained, Mrs. Jones pulls the switch and they go down. Convinced that she has them all safely locked up, Mrs. Jones goes down to investigate. She stands on the trap listening to the altercations, when her infant son pulls the switch. In turn a policeman is thrown into the trap. It is the infant son who finally straightens out the trouble and then gets spanked for it.

A MIDNIGHT SCARE (Jan. 20).—Joe and Harry are visiting Geraldine. They are invited by her father to remain over night. Joe is afraid of ghosts and Harry determines to play a joke on him. During the night he puts a bed sheet over himself and goes into Joe's room. Joe gets up and starts to run. Harry chases him around the house and father, hearing the noise, gets up to investigate. Joe gets his gun and retreats from the house with father after him. Mistaking the old man for the ghost, he shoots and wounds him in the hand. The boys sneak back to the house, later, and to bed. Father gets the doctor. In the morning Joe imagines that it was a dream. As he finishes telling of it at the breakfast table, father enters and relates how a fool shot him in the hand. Joe realizes his mistake and beats a hasty retreat.

THE SHADOW OF A CRIME (Jan. 25).—Edith Winslow, daughter of a wealthy parent, is engaged to Chester Brown, a decent fellow. Chester saves her from the advances from the gardener. When the gardener is discharged, he swears vengeance on Chester. Later, the gardener steals some money from Winslow's home under circumstances which compromise Chester. The gardener lays in wait for the boy as he leaves the house and attempts to stab him. Chester runs. A detective is put on the case. Meanwhile Chester has put the gardener out of business with a club; Chester imagines that he has killed him and flees. After roaming around he returns to Edith's home and confesses that he has killed a man. She questions him about the theft. He is arrested and is about to be taken away when a laborer arrives at the house with the information that he has found the money in the gardener's clothes. Chester is vindicated and the gardener is arrested.

COMING HOME (2 parts—Jan. 21).—John Sprague, a promising young country minister, wins the love and hand of a simple country girl, Margaret. Her father does not look favorably on the match owing to Sprague's rather advanced ideas in social relations and pleasure. He had previously encouraged an amateur theatrical performance in which Margaret had made a hit as Juliet. Shortly after the young pair are married and moved to the city, where John becomes the rector of a fashionable church.

Time goes on and with it comes success for both. Margaret changes from her simple country ways, and becomes somewhat of a society butterfly. Their home is brightened by the arrival of a baby girl. Though the wife continues to have a big love for her husband, she pursues social pleasure. Then comes financial difficulties; and the trouble brings all the wife's latent good to the surface. In her desire to help her husband she remembers her success as an amateur performer, and determines to get a position on the stage, thereby earning enough to cover their losses.

She secures a place and the indications are that she is going to make good. She has kept it a secret from her husband. But he finds out and then there is a misunderstanding—he mistakes her motives. But Margaret faces sterner problems and worries not required by her husband. She comes to realize it—realizes that even financial failure cannot justify the forsaking of home and loved ones. Her intentions were good, however.

In the end Sprague comforts his wife in a great sorrow—the loss of her father—and leads her from the room to a better and fuller realization of her wifely duties in the future.

AN ENCHANTED VOICE (Jan. 25).—Mr. High-tone, the famous singer, arrives at the village hotel. The proprietor and his maids fall over themselves in an effort to show him the best room in the house. After ushering him to his room they listen outside the door while High-tone goes to the piano and proceeds to sing a lullaby. His listeners outside and the ensembled guests downstairs are enchanted. They listen spellbound. They commence to gently sway back and forth and indulge in the most weird dances. The song ends! Instantly the spell is broken and the entire lobby comes tumbling down about the ears of the guests and the proprietor. All is excitement. They beg High-tone to sing once more. He proceeds downstairs, where he warbles once more. Instantly the pillars replace themselves, the ceiling becomes whole again, and the broken furniture is pieced together, and the entire room once more assumes its natural condition, under the spell of the enchanting voice.

HE DOESN'T CARE TO BE PHOTOGRAPHED (Jan. 25).—Newlywed buys a camera and attempts to photograph the kid. He tries to pose him, but darling refuses to stand for it. He chases him in the bedroom. Baby crawls under the bed. Papa follows him, but it is too dark to take a picture there. Chased by Newlywed, the kid runs under the table and from there around and in the back of the piano. Newlywed attempts to photograph him from the top of the piano and comes near breaking his neck. He gets him at last with a startling rear view and snaps the button. The neighbors call. They are shown the rear view of baby, and are told it is a wonderful likeness. They leave disgusted, while the Newlyweds admire the photograph of their darling.

POWERS.

TOO MANY COOKS (Jan. 19).—Carson, a happy-go-lucky clubman, refuses the invitation of his friends to dine at the club, and goes home in anticipation of a "real dinner." When he arrives home he finds his wife in the kitchen bemoaning the fact that the cook has left. Together they prepare the meal. The blunders he makes, the dishes he breaks and the swearing he does all tend to throw the household into a state of limbus. A messenger enters with a telegram telling that his mother-in-law is coming to spend a week. Carson leaves his wife weeping and goes to his club for sympathy.

Carson, a little tipsy, is assisted to his door by his friend. Through the keyhole he sees the mother-in-law waiting for him. He thinks he would rather enter the house through the dining-room window; he is mistaken for a burglar by a policeman and is rescued by the mother who pulls him in by the ear and lays down the law to him. This is the beginning of a line of complications which result in victory for the clubman. The last cook accepts a bribe, frightens and annoys the mother until she flees in terror and disgust.

THE DEUCE AND TWO PAIR (Jan. 23).—The elopement plans of George Love and Hazel Sweet are intercepted by Miss Freeze, spinster aunt of Helen. The aunt disguises in Helen's clothes, elopes with George, and the two are apparently married. They go to a nearby cafe for their wedding dinner, where Miss Freeze keeps her face judiciously veiled. In the meantime, unconscious of what has transpired, Helen is waiting for her lover. Spike, a burglar, climbs the ladder which has been placed for Helen's elopement. Helen thinks that it is George below. She throws her grips out of the window. They strike Spike and knock him senseless.

Helen goes for the police and discovers George and Miss Freeze in the cafe. She faints. When all have revived, George offers $500 to anyone who will extricate him from his embarrassment. Spike confesses that it was he who married George and the spinster. He had bound the minister in preparation to robbing his house, when the bridal couple arrived. To allay suspicion, he performed the marriage ceremony. George is delighted to learn that the marriage was illegal, and forthwith he takes Helen to the real minister, and they are married.

NESTOR.

COUNTESS BETTY'S MINE (Jan. 21).—Countess Betty Ardmore inherits from an uncle a large mining property in the United States. At the advice of her counselor she comes to America to personally superintend the conduct of her property. Her brother, a dissolute fellow, is left out of the inheritance, but at his solicitation and promise to reform, she takes him with her. At the mine they meet Wallace, a thoroughly independent American, who dislikes peerage on general principles. He has had entire charge of the mine subsequent to the death of the uncle. The brother and Wallace instinctively dislike each other. The Countess likes Wallace, but resents his independence.

Later, Wallace comes upon the brother at the cafe, and a fight ensues. The brother is beaten and Wallace promises not to tell his sister. Shortly following this incident, Wallace is alone in the office. With revenge foremost in his mind, the brother places a charge of dynamite under the house, lights the fuse, and retires to a safe distance to watch. When it is about time for the dynamite to explode, the Countess enters the office. Wallace and the Countess leave the office by the rear door. The brother is caught in his own trap and killed. The Countess looks to Wallace for comfort—and finds it.

SNOBBERY (Jan. 23).—The Gaiety Company goes broke when the manager skips with the proceeds. Ramona wires her aunt, Mrs. Van Horn, for money. This stately lady grows angry; she is giving a house party and is ashamed of the lively Ramona and her stage ways. However, she sends the money and in due time Ramona arrives and proceeds to inject liveliness into the party. This is viewed with disgust by her aunt, with annoyance to Dode, who is trying to "catch" Ned Travis, a guest, and with pleasure by Ned himself, who, having made the mistake of taking Ramona too cheaply, finds that she has both dignity and sense, and promptly falls in love with her. This affection is increased when he finds her snubbed.

A guest loses a necklace, which has been taken by Dode. Ramona is accused and is not allowed to leave the house. Ned sets to work to find the culprit, knowing that Ramona is not guilty. Ned meets Dode on the porch as she is returning from a pawn shop. She stumbles and her bag flies open. When she has gone to her room Ned sees a pawn ticket at his feet. He seeks Ramona and they make Dode return the necklace to the guest's room and advise her to leave. Ramona is now cleared by the discovery of the necklace, and Ned decides to marry her forthwith, and "snobbery" takes a fall.

BISON.

FOR THE FREEDOM OF CUBA (2 parts — Jan. 24).—Felix, an American, is employed as a bookkeeper at a large hacienda in Cuba. Jaun, a half-breed overseer of the estate, loves the planter's daughter. He makes brutal advances to her, and the girl is saved from his violence by Felix. Jaun is deposed as overseer and Felix is given the position. In a spirit of revenge the peon steals Arabia, the daughter's horse, rides to the headquarters of the Spanish general of the district and reports that the hacendiro is recruiting a detachment of insurgents. During Jaun's absence the horse effects its own escape.

The planter is arrested, taken to the Spanish headquarters and sentenced to be shot at sunrise. An insurgent leader in the vicinity is notified of the proceeding and hurries with his detachment of rebels to aid in the rescue. The trusty horse carried a file to the prisoner and after the bars have been demolished he carries the planter to his friends. The Spanish soldiery gives chase and is caught in an ambuscade and captured. Jaun has returned to the hacienda to take the daughter away, but his evil purpose is interrupted by the arrival of a United States soldier with despatches to Felix. The insurgents arrive with their prisoners and Felix reads a despatch, which tells that Santiago has fallen and that his services as a military spy are ended. Jaun steals away in an attempt to escape, but Arabia chases him back into the patio, where the half-breed lands in a fountain.

THE UNSIGNED AGREEMENT (2 parts—Jan. 20).—The story opens when a labor agitator makes advances to Nell, an innocent girl whose life has been spent in the factory and whose love has been won by Harry, the profligate mill-owner's son. Following the girl's repulse of the agitator, Harry warns him to keep away from her. Thus the agitator has personal reasons to force labor troubles upon the mill-owner.

In a saloon brawl Harry strikes the agitator over the head with a chair and leaves him for dead. Believing that he would be arrested for murder, Harry joins the army and is sent to Cuba. Nell is left in a delicate condition.

The father, grief-stricken on hearing of it, marries the girl himself. The agitator, recovered, uses his utmost efforts to effect a strike. By deception he leads the workmen to believe that the factory owner has refused their demands and they are aroused until they decide to destroy the factory. In the large factory ignite and there it a terrific is overturned and a fire begins. The militia is called and with other citizens they fight the strikers. At the height of the battle Harry, the son, returns, but in the melee he is killed. Explosives in the larg factory ignite and there is a terrific explosion.

Even after this the owner is willing to forgive his employees and he contemplates presenting each with two weeks' salary as a Christmas gift, until he learns of his son's death. All the sympathy in him freezes and he refuses to befriend all and any.

THE RETURN OF HELEN REDMOND (2 parts—Jan. 19).—Neil Forrester, clubman, marries Helen Redmond, a chorus girl, against his clergyman brother's wishes. A girl is born to the couple. Helen tires of domestic life and after a quarrel with her husband returns to the stage and Bohemia, where she forgets all in its whirl and gayety. Forrester dies and his brother assumes charge of the child, bringing her up to believe that her mother is dead and was a good woman. She is now ten years old. One night after the show Helen gives a supper to her friends in her flat, and one of the guests sends her regrets on account of her young daughter's illness. This awakens in Helen thoughts of her own daughter and she retires to her own room broken-hearted and resolved to see her the next day.

She goes next day and finds the child resembles her and humors her by saying that she knew her mother and that she was a good woman. The minister returns, recognizes Helen and orders her out of the house. She first pleads for the child, then demands it, it is hers. The minister changes his tone and tells Helen that it would be wrong to disillusion the child, now that she thinks her dead and a good woman and a greater wrong to bring her up among her own kind. Helen sinks under these reproaches, but is persistent. While the girl is being brought in Helen lapses in a deep reverie. In this state she has visions of bringing the girl home. The inherited taint manifests itself and the girl grows up like her mother, with a weakness for paint, frills and smiles of men, and later Helen's friend elopes with the girl. When the minister returns with Marjorie, Helen's daughter, she tells him she realizes what he says is true and that it is better for her to continue to grow up under his care. She renounces the stage, gives music lessons as a means of livelihood and is soon reunited with her daughter in the enjoyment of a happy future.

AT THE POTTER'S WHEEL (Jan. 24).—The picture opens with scenes at a pottery located at Suresne, a small town near Paris, France. The potters and decorators are seen at work and a vase is made on the potter's wheel. Among the girls employed in the decorating of the porcelain is Vera Nemours, a poor girl who is doing most artistic work. She is living with an old woman, Jeanne Eaton, who has become so feeble with age and infirmities that she is no longer useful, and the master of the works, Jean Montparnasse, finally discharges her. She returns to her poor lodgings in despair. Montparnasse has conceived a violent passion for Vera, which culminates when he attempts to seize her violently. Roual Nevers, a young artist who is the chief designer for the pottery, sees the predicament in which Vera is placed and knocks down the villain.

A beautiful vase which we see made on the wheel, put in the ovens and baked, is brought to Vera to be decorated. A girl who really loves Montparnasse is jealous of his attentions to Vera, and as Vera goes to the window to admire the beauty of the vase, the girl trips her. She falls and the vase is shattered to pieces. Vera returns to her squalid home hopeless, finding her aged companion in despair; they agree to die, as the future holds no hope. They turn on the gas and are to die in each other's arms. Montparnasse comes to their room to obtain possession of the girl. He attempts to break in the door, but is admitted by the old lady temporarily dissuaded from her purpose, and he attacks the girl. The old woman, with

PRINCESS.

WHEN THE CAT CAME BACK (Jan. 16).—Joe's young and pretty wife, May, is extremely suspicious and jealous of the landlady's daughter, and when Joe tries to get a speck of dust out of Nell's eye, May thinks it is a love scene. When Joe enters the room she accuses him of making love to the girl, and Joe ridicules her. Later, May rushes out angry. Joe, thinking it will blow over, reclines on a couch to read, and Nell chases a runaway cat into the room only to be caught by Joe's wife returning. This time she's sure things are not right, and leaves the house, with Joe in pursuit. The difference cannot be patched up, and May returns to sob it out alone on the couch. And the kitten figures again, but this time Mr. Gordon chases it, only to be caught by the returning Joe on his knees at the couch, looking for a whip he dropped. Of course Joe knew it was all right, but he wouldn't let May think so, until it dawned upon her that that was just the position Joe was in when she accused him of infidelity. And then she insisted upon being forgiven, and Joe forgave her.

THANHOUSER.

ADRIFT IN A GREAT CITY (Jan. 13).—A workingman in a large city saved his money and was finally enabled to send to his wife and daughter in Europe passage money to his new home. He arranged to meet them at the pier, but on his way there he was injured in an accident and taken unconscious and unidentified to a hospital. The two women arrived in America, to find themselves homeless and friendless. The daughter finally secured a position in a sweatshop, but her eyesight failed her rapidly, and she was soon thrown out of that position, blind and helpless. In her happier days she had been an amateur musician and now the violin, once a source of amusement, became the only reliance of these two women, for the daughter played the violin and the mother begged in the streets.

In the meantime, the father had been convalescing in the hospital, and messengers he sent to seek his loved ones returned to report that no trace of the women could be found. One pleasant afternoon the convalescent was weakly reclining in a chair on the hospital grounds, and a blind girl staggered in and explained to the doctor, who was chatting with the patient, that she had lost her way. The kindly doctor questioned her and she told her story, not knowing one of the two listeners was her father, who at first had not recognized her. Her grief was speedily turned to joy when he announced himself and a fresh cause for thanksgiving came when the doctor told them that he knew the girl's sight could be restored. Thus after many tribulations was the family reunited.

COALS OF FIRE (Jan. 16).—The merchant had succeeded in business because he was utterly heartless and had ground down all opposition. His employees hated him, his competitors feared him, and the servants in his home lived in mortal dread of him There was only one person in the world who was not afraid of him and that was his motherless little daughter, a mere baby, but who knew that her word was law with her father. One of the merchant's employees was a clerk who had grown gray in the service of the firm, and who in any ordinary business would have been regarded as a pensioner. In this case, however, he was brutally discharged for no reason other than age, and found it impossible to secure a place elsewhere. The clerk had supported his little grandson, his only surviving relative, but soon positions were reversed and all that the old man and the small boy had to live on were the pennies that the youngster made by selling newspapers.

One day the clerk came home to find his grandson feeding a little girl whom he had picked up on the streets lost and not knowing where she lived. The clerk recognized her as the daughter of his employer, and his heart filled with rage. He ordered the child to leave at once and scowled angrily at her, but the little girl did not know what fear was, for in all her young life no one had ever spoken crossly to her or looked angrily at her. She thought the old man was trying to amuse her, gurgled happily when he frowned, confidently climbed into his lap and told him she liked him. Probably he would not have been cross to her under any circumstances, but the child was so sweet that no one could "stay mad at her," so the old clerk instead of throwing her out made her as comfortable as possible, put her to sleep in his own bed and watched over her while his son went to notify her father. The merchant came to the house post haste to find his darling child guarded by the man he had turned out to starve. For once he was stricken with remorse when he realized how the man he had injured had done him a kindness he would never forget. Now the clerk is back at his old desk again and he knows he has a life-long job, for his employer, no longer gruff and bullying, has told him so.

A TICKET TO RED HORSE GULCH (Jan. 11).—Jack Oliver, who was a telephone lineman in a large city, had a disagreement with his superior and was discharged. He had never been able to save much money and when, after several weeks of earnest searching he found no work, the situation began to look serious. The opportunity knocked, for Jack found a railway ticket on the street, and in spite of diligent effort, was unable to return it to its owner. The ticket read to Red Horse Gulch, a mining town in the city, so, determined to have a tilt with fate he took the ticket and set out for the mining town

An old miner, Bill Salter, was in need of a man to help him with his claim. Laborers were scarce, and he finally chanced upon Jack Oliver. The "Tenderfoot" proved to be a good worker, and developed into a miner of no mean ability. Molly Salter, the miner's daughter, who had charge of the little telephone exchange at Red Gulch, became a warm friend to the young man. Gold was discovered on Bill Salter's claim, but before it could be properly registered, "claim jumpers" seized it and sent one of their number on a swift horse to town. When Salter and Jack discovered the intruders they learned that the men's confederate would reach Red Horse Gulch in half an hour. The roads were rough and the distance to town could not be covered in less than two hours, and yet the seemingly impossible was accomplished, for Jack managed with the aid of Molly to file the claim and outwit the desperadoes.

JAKE'S HOODOO (Jan. 13).—Jake Towne, poor but enterprising, loves Lucy Small, who does not share her father's prejudices. She agrees to elope when opportunity offers. Jake is instructed by letter to be at Lucy's at dark, Friday, the 13th, when the coast will be clear. Jake, owning only one suit, upsets a pan of beans on his trousers. He repairs the damage with gasoline and hangs the garments out to air while he shaves. A tramp fresh from an encounter with a bulldog sees Jake's pants and succumbs to temptation. Jake, minus an indispensable article of attire, is desperate. Henpeck runs out of tobacco. Mrs. H. gives him ten minutes to get some. Jake holds him up and borrows his loud but whole trousers. Henpeck, frightened to death of his wife, wraps a blanket round him and sneaks home through back alleys. But Mrs. H. has already gone to look for him. She sees his trousers going down the street with a girl, follows them to the minister's, and sets the policeman on the track of the bigamist. The bridegroom is rudely torn from his wife and taken to jail. The tramp in Jake's pants sees Lucy's window open and gets a ladder and gets into Small's. Mrs. Henpeck goes home and faints when she finds Hen in bed. They get Jake out of jail, and he goes after Lucy, who has gone home, climbed the ladder and cried herself to sleep. Jake calls her and she does not hear. Then the tramp, carrying her father's cash box, steals in and appropriates her jewelry. The slam of the door awakens her, she shrieks, and Jake rushes to the rescue. Tramp and husband collide half way up the ladder and fall, each trying to get the box. Lucy shrieks and the policeman who responds meets with Small. The policeman seizes the tramp, Jake recognizes his trousers and makes the unfortunate one take them off. Indoors Small decides that Jake wouldn't be a bad son-in-law after all. When he realizes that it is too late to object he gives in with a good grace, and invites Jake to remain, which he thankfully does, his day of hoodoo being over.

THE LACKEY (Jan. 17).—Judge Stevens, of the Supreme Court, was a jurist of the highest type, and a devoted father. He was a widower, wholly engrossed in his pretty daughter, Mary. The girl had many suitors, but seemed to regard them all merely as friends, for love had not yet come into her life. The butler in the Stevens' home was a young man who had enjoyed a considerable education and was far superior to the majority of people in his station of life. Mary Stevens regarded him as a well-trained servant, but the butler, realiing fully the hopelessness of his position, fell in love with his employer's daughter. He told no one of his passion, but the judge accidentally learned of his regard and scornfully dismissed him. Then the father, to his surprise and indignation, discovered that his daughter had begun to look upon the manly young servant with favor.

The judge dined at his club one evening, and while enjoying an after supper chat with friends was summoned to the phone. The call was from his house, and he did not recognize the voice at the other end of the wire. He was soon enlightened, for the man informed him that he was a prisoner whom the judge had sentenced several months before and who had just escaped from prison. The outlaw told the judge that he intended to kill his daughter and escape. The father heard his daughter's voice at the phone, and then the convict took her place and tauntingly declared that her end was near. A pistol shot rang out, and the judge staggered back from the telephone, covering his face with his hands. Meantime, in the lonely country house, a battle raged, for the butler returning to the house, discovered Mary's danger, and the pistol was fired as he seized the desperado. After a hard struggle, he crawled to the phone and told the frantic father that his daughter was safe.

As the girl watched the struggle and knew that this servant, whose affection for her she had long known, was risking his life for her, the liking which she had always had grew stronger, and she realized that she loved him, even though the barrier of social position separated them. The judge arrived at his home and the convict was taken away to prison, but the father was confronted with a great problem, for he realized that although his daughter loved the butler, that the barrier of caste separated them and that the future would hold much unhappiness in store for them if they married. It was the butler who solved the problem. Bravely he explained to the judge and his daughter that he felt his presence in their home would be no longer wise, and with a smiling face, which belied a breaking heart, he went forward into the world, treasuring forever a parting glance from the woman whom he loved but could never wed.

ROMANCE OF SUNSHINE ALLEY (Jan. 28).—Jimmy Mullen, a bootblack, secretly admires Mary Denton, a factory girl of Sunshine Alley. He rescues her from a gang of loafers, putting up a fight with the ringleader. The fight is witnessed by Bill Cross, a fight promoter, who is always on the lookout for new material, and sees a wonderful future in Jimmy. Jimmy is arrested and when Mary explains to the judge why Jimmy was fighting, the judge paroles Jimmy in Mary's care. Mary has an invalid mother, for whom she is very anxious to buy an invalid's chair. Jimmy, when approached by Bill Cross to go into training, breaks his promise not to fight, so as to get money to help Mary buy the chair for her mother. The fight is witnessed by the judge who sentenced Jimmy. When Jimmy is brought before him for having broken his parole he remembers the ardous fight that Jimmy put up. When Bill Cross explains to the judge that Jimmy went into the fight just for the money because Mary needed it, he sentences Jimmy to either marriage with Mary or ten years in jail.

THE CIRCLE OF FATE (2 parts—Jan. 16).—Antone Tojetti and his pretty daughter, Maria, are street musicians in Venice. John Strom, an American millionaire, makes love to Maria, and finally persuades her to leave for America with him. Her father sees them just as they are leaving, but she will not return to him.

Two years later, Maria, abandoned by John, returns to her father, who has now become a guide in the mountains. She dies and Antone vows vengeance. Some time after this, John Strom, now married, is touring Europe and he and his party seek a guide to visit Vesuvius. Antone takes the position, John not recognizing in him the father of Maria. They make the ascent at night and when they have arrived at the top, Antone tells Strom that from another angle a better view can be had. When Antone and Strom have reached this point, Antone makes himself known, tells him what has happened to Maria and that he is going to push him into the crater. Strom is horrified, but Antone with the madness of a wild man, hurls him into the burning mass. His body in the descent falls in front of his wife and the remainder of the party, who are horror stricken as they see his agonized face pleading with them from the mass below.

hides Slim in the clothes closet. Doctor West arrives and unconscious of Slim's presence, he attends to the patient. Jane is, of course, nervous and the doctor tries to soothe and calm her. Slim, from his hiding-place shows jealous rage, as he sees the doctor's attentions to Jane, and when the doctor is gone, Slim wants to follow and kill him. Jane, to restrain him, is very nice to him and binds the arm that was wounded in the scuffle with the police. On his way home the doctor remembers that he left his bag in Jane's room. He goes back for it and finds Jane and Slim very close together. He knows that she must have been hiding the man, and thinks Slim must be her lover. Slim tries to embrace Jane and when she repulses him he is angry and threatens to find the doctor and kill him. Jane, fearing for the doctor's safety, informs the police. Slim's wound is now very painful and he enters the office of Doctor West for treatment. He then sees that the doctor is his rival. Slim draws his gun, but the doctor is too swift and strong for him. He disarms him, and thinking that perhaps Jane loves him, he binds up his wounds and tells him to go. As he is leaving the doctor's office he is seen by the policeman. He starts to run, but is shot and killed. Jane, anxious about the doctor, arrives. As she sees Slim's body she shows distress. The doctor expresses sympathy, and shows relief when Jane explains she had no love for Slim—only gratitude.

THE TWO SLAVES (Jan. 14).—Mr. Carter is a lonely bachelor and is told by his doctor that he has heart disease, and that if he wants to live he must quit smoking. But Carter, thinking that there is not much joy in life, sticks to his old companion, the pipe.

In an obscure part of the town Barry, a drunkard, lives with his five-year-old daughter, Ida. Barry comes home one night with not only a load but a bottle. Ida is old enough to know that that is the stuff that inebriates, but does not cheer, so she hides the bottle in the closet. When Barry wakes up next morning, he can't find his bottle, so has to go to the saloon for a bracer. He takes not one, but many of them, and staggers from the saloon into trouble. He is sent to the hospital. As time passes and her father does not return, Ida starts out to look for him. She wanders about until she is lost. Carter, who is visiting some friends, discovers Ida and comforts her. She wins his heart. He decides to adopt her, and now that he has something worth while to live for, he takes the doctor's advice and quits smoking.

In a few days Barry is able to leave the hospital. He discovers the whereabouts of his child and claims her. Carter, who is now very much attached to Ida, is very disappointed and returns to his pipe for consolation. Barry, who is only weak, not bad, vows that he will quit drinking and bring up his child properly. But that night Barry finds the bottle that Ida hid in the closet. He struggles hard, but the desire is too strong. Then, realizing how helpless he is, he takes Ida back to the man he knows will care for her and wanders off into the night.

THE FAITH OF HER FATHER (2 parts—Jan. 17).—Ruth, ashamed of her father's pawnbroker's shop, does not tell her Christian friends of it. She is loved by Nathan, a Jewish lad, but does not return his affection, for she is being courted by rich young Dick North. Dick's mother incurs some debts from cards, which her husband refuses to pay. She pawns a diamond star with Ruth's father and later tells her husband and son that the jewel was stolen. Ruth receives an invitation to a dance and seeing the diamond star prevails upon her father to allow her to wear it that evening. He weakly consents. Dick is at the dance and recognizes the star. She tells him that her father gave it to her. He says that her father must be a thief; that the star was stolen from his mother. She realizes that she will have to do that thing she loathes to do—take the boy to her father's shop. She does, the duplicate ticket is shown, and Dick realizes the truth. He tries to make up with Ruth for his suspicion, but she tells him his ways are not hers. As he turns to go the old man gives him his star to take to his mother as a token of good will. As the girl sees Dick go out of her life she turns to Nathan, and for the first time realizes his worth and goodness. And old Jacobs sees a love story and a better understanding coming between the two young people of the same faith.

LEVI'S LUCK (Jan. 1).—Joe Parks, a salesman, starts out one morning to see his customers; on the way he meets a friend, who invites him to have a drink. In the saloon they meet another mutual friend and while talking, Parks' sample grip is knocked from the bar unknown to any one. Pat, an Irish foreman, comes in for a can of beer and unconsciously kicks the grip into the street, where Spunky Jim, a tough finds it, and carries it off. Parks, about this time discovers the loss and starts on the hunt. Spunky cannot get the grip open; after trying for some little time, he, however, gets an idea, and immediately puts it into execution. Taking the grip, he accosts a bold son of Erin's Isle, and bets him that he cannot carry the grip across the street and back again without setting it down. The Irishman accepts the wager, and taking the grip, after putting up his money, starts across the street. When he comes back he sets the grip on the ground, and consequently, not seeing the trick in the bet, loses. He thinks the joke is so good that he persuades Spunky to leave the grip with him, which Spunky does. The Irishman proceeds to the German bakery and plays the same joke and bet on the unthinking German. The German, anxious to get even, suggests that they play it on the Jew, Levi. They accost Levi in front of his store and the bet is made, each one wagering heavily. Levi takes the grip and crosses the street. On the opposite side he sees a silver dollar on the sidewalk, and stooping to pick it up, the watchful German and Irishman think he will set the grip down, but they are disappointed, as he puts the grip under his arm. When he returns to the spot where they are waiting, he, much to their dismay, hangs the grip on a nail. About this time, Parks, who has searched everywhere for his grip, comes in sight, and seeing the grip on the nail in front of Levi's, rushes up and demands to know who owns the grip. The German and the Irishman, beaten at their own game, thinking to get the Jew into trouble, point to Levi. Parks says the grip is his and Levi returns it to him. Parks opens the grip and they all see that it is filled with jewelry. The Irishman and German are overcome, and for Levi's honesty, Parks rewards him with a roll of money, thus proving that honesty is the best of policy, especially for Lucky Levi.

THE BAD MAN FROM THE EAST (Jan. 1).—Jim Jarvis and Chas. Ives, two very much married men, while playing cards at the club, very much over-stayed their time, and when Jarvis called Ives' attention to the fact, it was two A. M. Hurrying home, Jarvis was met by his wife as soon as he climbed in the window. She laid the law down to him and dragged him to the attic and made him sleep there as punishment. Ives, upon arriving home, started to bully things, and his young wife would have let him get away with it, but her mother interfered, and as a consequence, Ives was ordered from the house. Broke from the poker game, and angry, he wandered the streets for a while, and at last becoming sleepy, he climbed into an open freight car. An engine was coupled on the car and six days later, tired and hungry, Ives finds himself in Goldbrick, Ariz. He climbs out of the car, and is wandering up the track, when he espies a box, which has fallen from an express car. Opening it he sees it contains a full western outfit. This he proceeds to put on. Having dressed himself in the borrowed clothes, he struts up the main street in search of food. Bad Steve, a bully, has just frightened the boys at Thirsty Thornton's saloon, and is about coming out of the place when he bumps into Ives. Ives is angry at the affront, as he terms it, and starts in and beats Bad Steve up a bit, much to the amusement of the boys of the saloon, who, after Ives has driven the bully away, proclaim him a real hero, and invite him inside. Needless to say, he goes, and eats nearly all the victuals in the place. After passing a week in the west as a bad man from the east, he sends for his friend, Jarvis. Upon receipt of the letter Jarvis packs up and leaves for Goldbrick. His wife, after his departure, finds the letter, and together with Mrs. Ives and her mother, they all start in pursuit. They arrive in Goldbrick and reach Thornton's Dance Hall just as Ives has introduced Jarvis as a most wonderful hero and all the boys and girls are making a great fuss over him. The wives and mother-in-law take a hand and after putting the place in a terrible state of excitement, lead the truant husbands home by the ears, very much crestfallen, and sorry they tried to run away.

THE ADVENTURESS (3 parts—Jan. 10).—Arsene Laugier, marries an adventuress long after his first wife's death. This autumnal love has quite blinded him to his wife's true character. She introduces her lover, Serge, as her brother. These two accomplices soon begin plotting.

Laugier receives a telegram from his daughter, who is returning from Brazil. Madame Laugier does not even know of her existence. Laugier shows her the telegram, and she hides her feelings and pretends to be pleased. Worried and uneasy, Laugier goes to meet his daughter. He tells her of his second marriage. It is a painful surprise, and the first meeting with his wife leaves no doubt as to their feelings for each other. Adrienne Laugier and Henry Verneuil, on the other hand, are mutually attracted. Jeanne Laugier makes an appointment with her lover in the drawing-room. Adrienne comes upon them suddenly and tells them they are a couple of adventurers. Laugier rushes upon the scene and is terribly distressed at the situation. In order to save him pain and humiliation, his daughter tells him it was she who arranged a meeting with Serge. The father is overcome with anger and he drives her away from home.

Meanwhile, Adrienne Laugier and Henry Verneuil have learnt to love each other and are engaged. Laugier notices that his check-book has been tampered with. His eyes at last opened to the full extent of his misfortunes, he finds his wife in the arms of her lover. Dishonored, forsaken and ruined, he goes to his daughter and she gives him all the money she inherited from her mother, and breaks off her engagement with Henry Verneuil. Laugier avenges himself. He fires twice at his wife and her lover. The latter is wounded, and Laugier is stricken with paralysis. Henry Verneuil breaks the sad news to Adrienne, and Laugier is conveyed to his daughter's home, where she spares nothing to comfort him. One morning Doceor Guilloteaux writes to Henry Verneuil that he has been elected to a post of £1,000 a year. Laugier hears of it; he staggers in, and with dying breath bids them go and be happy.

FAMOUS PLAYERS.

AN AMERICAN CITIZEN (Four Parts—Jan. 10).—Berresford Cruger, junior partner of the New York brokerage firm of Barbury, Brown & Cruger, is left a fortune of 60,000 pounds, by an English uncle, Carew, on the condition that he renounce his American citizenship, become a British subject, and marry an Englishwoman, the money otherwise being assigned to the Archaeological Society of England. Cruger patriotically refuses the fortune on these conditions, when his pretty English cousin, Beatrice Carew, who has been disinherited in favor of Cruger, because of a past romance with an American, suggests to him that they marry, and so keep the money in the family. Cruger's American chivalry, and a strong interest in his attractive cousin are aroused. At this critical moment the disappearance of Brown, with $80,000 which he had had in trust for a Miss Georgia Chapin, is discovered. Cruger and Barbury feel responsible for their partner's defalcation, which adds another incentive to Cruger's consent to a hasty marriage with Beatrice, who immediately returns to England, after both have agreed to leave each other absolutely free.

With his newly acquired money Cruger secretly replaces the missing funds, and invests in the Opera House block of a Wyoming "boom" town, proceeding to forget all about it. Later, he and Barbury go to Nice, where Cruger again meets his cousin-wife. Here they fall seriously in love with each other, and many complications, pathetic and comic, ensue. The situation is further confused by the sudden reappearance of Brown, who, it transpires, is the missing ex-fiancé of Beatrice, believed by her to have been accidentally killed. Beatrice is now fully recovered from her love affair with Brown, but his former affection for her is revived when he learns that her fortune, after all, has not been lost. Brown's utter lack of character and manliness is evidenced by his efforts to part Cruger and Beatrice. Cruger realizes that Brown's design is to secure Beatrice's fortune by marrying her himself, and, in a dramatic scene, tells Brown that he had induced himself to marry Beatrice in order to restore Miss Chapin's stolen funds, and that he would consent to a divorce from Beatrice, if Brown would agree to return her portion of the estate in the event that he married her. Brown's ardor cools at this proposal, and he verifies Cruger's scant opinion of him by again disappearing. Beatrice misunderstands Cruger's motive, and condemns him as mercenary. Cruger can offer no defense and secretly bears the pang of Beatrice's innocent misjudgment. Beatrice leaves Cruger in anger and resentment. With a comic irony, the Archaeological Society at this juncture, which has sued to recover the money on the grounds that Cruger was not to share the bequest with Beatrice, Carew's disinherited daughter, wins the action, and Cruger and Beatrice are forced to surrender their fortune and are left without funds or resources.

With noble devotion, Cruger stints himself to send Beatrice money without her knowledge of the sacrifice, and is himself on the verge of starvation, when joyful word arrives that his Wyoming Opera House lot has really "boomed," and made him $50,000. Meanwhile, Georgia Chapin has learned of his unselfish replacement of her stolen funds, and his sacrifices for Beatrice, with which she loses no time in acquainting her. Awakened to a new realization of Cruger's real worth, Beatrice hastens to him to ask forgiveness, and is received with open arms by her hero, who has managed, through all his difficulties, to regain his American citizenship without losing wife or fortune.

WHAT THE GODS DECREE (Four parts).—Henriette D'Arsac, the wife of an adventurer, Charles D'Arsac, who has made his fortune in the African trade and now retired, one day reads of the excavation of the famous statue of the Goddess Kali, around whose neck is hung a necklace of precious stones and gold beads of inestimable value. This his wife ardently desires to possess and begs her husband to secure it. Unable to resist her pleadings, he sails for India and on reaching Bombay enlists the services of a guide to take him to the Sanctuary. They reach the sacred spot late in the night, but the guide, seized by a sudden fright, runs away. D'Arsac, revolver in hand, advances toward the statue, unclasps the necklace with trembling hands and starts to make his escape when, turning around, he fancies he sees the goddess raising her two hands as if in the act of cursing him. The sacrilege is discovered the next day and D'Arsac is easily traced to a tavern, where he is trying to dissipate the hideous nightmare with drink. Kali, the Priestess, disguised as a man, and Doura, a faker of the secret cult, succeed in shipping as stokers on board D'Arsac's yacht, which at once starts on a return journey. They endeavor to secure the necklace while on board the yacht, but only succeed in arousing suspicion. Cutting a large hole above the waterline, they jump overboard and swim to shore before their absence is discovered. D'Arsac arrives and presents the necklace to his wife. The Hindoos succeed in gaining an entrance to the villa, but not until they have been forced to climb a tree, from whence they see wild beasts roaming the park, terrible guardians in their nocturnal rounds. They enter the drawing-room, overpower the guard, seize the necklace and disappear. An electric appliance warns D'Arsac of their presence. He pulls a lever. A trap opens and the two Hindoos drop into a cage, which slowly upsets in a cistern. By an act of Providence they are saved and escape by a subterranean passage leading to the sea. They engage a boat, but are followed by D'Arsac, who overtakes them, seizes the Hindoos and places them on board his yacht. When nearing Marseilles, Kali succeeds in breaking her bonds and jumps into the sea before D'Arsac and his men can prevent her. She manages to get to shore, exhausted, only to again fall into the hands of D'Arsac, who recovers possession of the necklace and leaves her on the shore half dead, where she is found several hours later by the gypsies. Misfortune follows misfortune in the household of D'Arsac, culminating in the supposed death of their daughter, who has been put into a hypnotic sleep under the powerful magnetic influence of Kali. Henriette is taken violently ill at sight of her daughter in this condition and is threatened with a loss of reason. D'Arsac now has but one desire: To return the cursed necklace. He rushes toward the glass case, seizes the necklace and brandishes it madly. A hand touches his shoulder: Kali, silent, immovable, is behind him. The adventurer pulls out a revolver, which he soon drops under the steady, imperious gaze of the Priestess. He crawls at Kali's feet and pleads forgiveness. She takes the necklace and slowly retreats backward, D'Arsac dropping to the floor in a faint. Kali, overcome with pity, relents and wakens the child. When D'Arsac regains consciousness, his wife and daughter are bending over him. The Priestess and the necklace have disappeared. Peace and quiet once more reign in the villa. The Priestess returns to India and the necklace once more graces the neck of the venerated idol.

A MAN'S SHADOW (Six parts—Jan. 20).—Roger Laroque, hearing of the dishonesty of Luverson, his employee, discharges him and earns his hatred. At a reception, Laroque meets Julia De Noirville, a lawyer's wife, and becomes infatuated with her. She reciprocates his attentions and consents to meet him the next day. Noticing that she is depressed, he persuades her to tell him the reason. She confides to him that she is in dire need of a large sum of money in order to avert impending disaster. Laroque promises to raise the money for her. On the strength of an offer from the government for an invention which he had submitted, he obtains the money from a loan broker, who resides opposite to him. Luverson, the discharged employee, has secured a position with the money lender and sees Laroque get the money. He follows him and sees him give the money to the lawyer's wife. Laroque's wife and child go for a drive. During the absence of the mother, the horse runs away with the little girl. The lawyer, De Noirville, attempts to stop the runaway and is severely injured. Laroque hears of the lawyer's bravery and calls with his wife and little girl to thank him. While there, Laroque meets Julia, who first learns that her lover is married. He tells her that he no longer loves her.

Luverson, for revenge, smashes the engine invented by Laroque. Owing to the damage done, the government rescinds the order. As a result, the money lender becomes anxious, and persuaded by Luverson, requests Laroque to return the money loaned. The lawyer is present when the request is received and noticing that Laroque is greatly distressed, he writes to the money lender advising that Laroque will go bankrupt if forced to pay and might do something rash. However, Laroque is compelled to pay, and leaves after a stormy interview. Seeing his employer putting the money in a safe, Luverson returns at night, disguised as Laroque, to rob the safe. He is discovered by the loan broker, who attacks him. Luverson kills his employer and makes his escape with the money. Laroque's wife, daughter, and servant, watching from their window for his return, witness the crime. Owing to the disguise, they believe that it was Laroque who committed the murder. Luverson, with threats of blackmail, compels the lawyer's wife to write an anonymous note to Laroque, thanking him for the money, which is returned with the note. Next day the crime is discovered. The lawyer's warning note is found and suspicion falls on Laroque. The police question his wife and child, but they deny all knowledge of the crime. The servant, however, confesses that she saw her master do the deed. The money, returned by Luverson, is found on Laroque. Bloodstains point to his guilt and he is arrested. De Noirville finds the note which accompanied the money and asks Laroque to tell to whom he loaned the money. To shield Julia, the lawyer's wife, he refuses to tell. He is brought to trial and De Noirville offers to defend him. Luverson sends a note to the lawyer during the trial advising that Laroque received the money from the former's wife. The lawyer is furious at this disclosure and refuses to defend the prisoner. He changes his mind, however, but owing to an attack of heart failure, he dies before he can disclose the name of the prisoner's debtor. Laroque is subsequently convicted and sent to prison. While in prison, he learns of the death of his wife. He succeeds in escaping and determines to return for his little girl, who is being fostered by relatives. On the road, he sees a burning house and rescues two children from the flames. He is horribly burned. The children's father gives him a suit of clothes to wear instead of his prison garb. Laroque calls at the home where his daughter is and takes her with him.

Ten years pass. Terribly disfigured by his burns, and under an assumed name, Laroque escapes detection. Suzanne, his daughter, goes to sketch in a nearby park. Raymond De Noirville, the son of the lawyer, chances to pass while on a hunting trip and speaks to her. They meet a second time, and Suzanne learns his identity. She writes to him and confesses that she is the daughter of the convict, Laroque. Raymond has fallen in love with Suzanne and is distressed by the news. He determines to search through his father's records and try to establish her father's innocence. He discovers the note which Luverson wrote to his father at the trial telling him that his wife, Raymond's mother, was the recipient of the money. Beside himself at the dreadful discovery, he confronts his mother with the proof of her perfidy. She confesses and promises to prove the innocence of Suzanne's father. She sends for Laroque and the chief of police and tells them that she will show them the real murderer. Through a decoy note, she persuades Luverson to call on her. Confronted by Laroque and the chief, he sees that he is cornered and attempts to shoot Laroque, but hits Raymond's mother instead. Mortally wounded, she begs for Laroque's forgiveness and passes away. With the stigma removed from her good name, Suzanne finds love and consolation in the arms of her lover, Raymond.

THE HOUSE OF MYSTERY (Four parts—Jan. 10).—Andrew Garfield, a banker, disowned his son for marrying beneath his station. He learns of his son's death and regrets his action. He determines to locate his son's widow and child in order to repair to some extent the results of his harshness. He advertises for them in the newspapers. The child chances to read the advertisement. Her mother decides to call on the banker, but has no suitable apparel. She writes a note to a neighboring family, asking for a loan, explaining the circumstances. These people, however, are a set of rogues, and take advantage of her confidence. Under pretence of helping her, they make her and her child prisoners and lock them in a wretched cellar. The woman then passes herself off to the banker as the widow whom he is seeking. Having been installed in the banker's home with her child, she succeeds in admitting her husband and her brother under the guise of servants.

Puzzled by a series of thefts, the banker calls in Nick Winter, a famous detective. He disguises himself as a doctor, and calls for the pretended purpose of treating the supposed widow, who has feigned an attack of paralysis. One night Nick finds Garfield drugged. He hides himself in the room and sees two masked men and a heavily veiled woman enter. He holds them up at the point of a gun, but they escape after switching off the electric lights. Then follows a series of remarkable escapades. Nick finds a note in his room advising him that he has been recognized and threatening him if he remains. He puts a dummy in his bed and sets an automatic picture camera to take the picture of any intruders. The robbers enter and attack the dummy, which they suppose to be the detective. He rushes in and captures both men. Then he brings in the banker to show him the prisoners. But again they have escaped. Nick takes the camera and develops the film, which shows him the prisoners being released by the mysterious woman. He recognizes the servants and proceeds to trail one of them. The trail leads to a tavern where the robber gives Nick the slip by a clever ruse. He steals a wagon and drives off. Nick gives chase but to all appearances the robber escapes and drives to the house where the real widow and her child are prisoners. Nick crawls out of the wagon in which he had hidden, captures the thief and rescues the captives. He then returns to the banker's home in another disguise. The thief makes his escape and returns to warn the others. Nick and the old man are made prisoners and placed in a dungeon of the old house. Learning of a secret contrivance for flooding the dungeon with sand, the robbers set the machinery in action. Soon the prisoners realize that they are doomed. Writing a note to the police, Nick fastens it to a pigeon which he had concealed in his hat, and releases it. The police get the note and arrive just in time to rescue the men and capture the robber band, who are this time sent to prison.

THE GAMBLER'S REVENGE (Four parts).—Banker Chavertin lives with his wife and niece, Helen. Chavertin is a partner of Mr. Ducroz in a bank in Paris. The stock exchange, the siren of the financial world, which attracts so many rash people into its coils, has got a peculiar fascination for Chavertin. Deceived by false financial outlooks, he speculates and continues to speculate. Not having enough means to meet his losses, Chavertin appropriates his partner's funds. His partner discovers the loss and listens to the confession of his unscrupulous partner. We have said that Mr. Chavertin has a niece, and Mr. Ducroz is passionately in love with the girl, who is engaged to young Mr. Pontois, a secretary to the foreign office. He says to Mr. Chavertin: "I love your niece Helen, prevail upon her to marry me and I shall forgive you." Pontois receives a note from Helen, inviting him to spend the evening at a family gathering. But the foreign minister shortly after asks him to finish a copy of a secret document of importance. "I shall take the document home and make a copy of it there," answered Mr. Pontois. But when Pontois leaves Chavertin's house the important document had disappeared from his pocket. Chavertin is making full preparation to utterly ruin him.

Helen's lover vigorously protests his innocence, but when an anonymous letter arrives, sent by the villainous Chavertin, asking him when he intends to deliver the secret document he has agreed to sell, this letter being ample proof of his guilt, James Pontois is sentenced to prison at hard labor, so the wretch Chavertin thus succeeds in separating the lovers. Helped by his prison comrades, James escapes. He makes for the city. His mind has only one thought: to prove his innocence. Not far from the place where James has fallen asleep there is a gambling house. That evening Mr. Pierreval runs in ill luck, he throws down his last bank note on the table, the roulette goes its constant, giddy way, and Pierreval has lost again. In despair he goes off in the direction of the river. Just before a young couple from the same gambling house, who had been more fortunate, see James sleeping. The lady has a compassionate thought. She asks her husband for a gold coin and throws it into the vagabond's hat. Pierreval comes along, the passion for gambling is still strong within him and he puts forth his hand and takes the money from James' hat. He runs back to the gambling house and the wheel of fortune this time turns in his favor. He thinks of the poor man who had been the cause of his good luck. He retraces his steps and arrives just in time to prevent James from jumping into the river. "I owe my fortune to you and I place it at your disposal," said Mr. Pierreval. Both go to the Grand Hotel, where Pierreval is staying.

Helen, rather than marry Ducroz, leaves her uncle's home and offers her services as a housemaid in the Grand Hotel. Very touching is the meeting between James and Helen. They tell each other of the painful vicissitudes they have passed. Pierreval, however, says to them, "Pretend you don't know each other and leave everything to me." George finds Chavertin in a cafe. The wretch who had been struck with remorse now tries to drown the remembrance of his guilt in alcohol. Pierreval pretends to have been entrusted by a foreign country to buy secret political documents. James and Pierreval arrange a meeting and for a certain sum of money they will receive the document. Pierreval goes at once to the minister and he explains: "Place a detective at my disposal and in twenty-four hours I will give you proof of my friend's innocence." The minister, who after having heard Pierreval's words, is convinced of James' innocence, accepts the proposal. Chavertin is in his study. He has an attack of delirium tremens. Someone knocks at the door. He thinks it is the foreign agent coming for the document, but a vision of vengeance appears before his eyes. James Pontois, Helen, Pierreval and a police detective surrounded by his men. Denial is useless. Chavertin confesses his infamy, then the wretch has an attack of furious anger and attempts suicide. His body is twisted in a sardonical laugh. Madness has got the best of Chavertin. Justice has passed over his head. James Pontois and his wife are fondling a pretty baby a few months old. APEX.

THE BLACK THIRTEEN (Three parts).—Chafing at a period of enforced idleness, Detective Hayes reads one morning in the paper that the notorious gang of criminals, known as the Black Thirteen, are actively pursuing their nefarious occupation in spite of all endeavors of the police to suppress them. He, however, has already instructed one of his scouts to investigate, and the latter now reports that he has traced the forged notes, which the gang have been circulating, to the house of a certain millionairess—Miss Dennison.

Hayes is delighted at the success of this preliminary investigation and at once takes up the case. Obtaining a post as footman at Miss Dennison's house, where the forged notes are put into circulation at a gaming table, he quickly discovers the ringleaders to be a "Dr. Preston" and John Verden, his "nephew" and another known as "Slim Jack," and that these are to meet the next evening in a waterside saloon called "The Blue Lantern." Hayes enters the den and watches, but is discovered. In the scramble, however, he manages to capture "Slim Jack," who to his immense astonishment, is no other than Miss Dennison herself. She pleads with him that she has been forced into it, and implores Hayes to rescue her from these men. Believing her, Hayes takes her under his charge and for better safety disguises her as his servant, Bob. Miss Dennison tells Hayes that "Dr. Preston" is waiting for her in a certain train at the Central Station, and Hayes makes off to capture him. "Slim Jack," however, is playing a double and dangerous game. Hayes is a minute too late, but hailing a motor cab gives chase and reaches a railway bridge as the train is passing under. A daring leap and he is on the roof of the train and quickly makes his way to "Dr. Preston's" compartment. The latter makes a bold bid for freedom, jumping from the train as it crosses a bridge into the river below.

Annoyed at his failure, Hayes returns just in time to see the "nephew" entering his chambers. Inside John Verden and Miss Dennison are hatching a plot to get Hayes out of the way, when two railway porters deliver a large trunk. Out of it springs Hayes and at the point of his revolver seizes Verden, but "Slim Jack" gets away. At the police station Hayes disguises himself as Verden's "uncle" and makes a sham affidavit laying the blame on Verden until the latter unable to contain his rage any longer, cries out, "It was you who fitted up Lonely Mill!" So Lonely Mill is the place where the forged notes are made! Throwing off the disguise as the "nephew" and assuming that of the "uncle," Hayes loses no time in following up the clue to Lonely Mill. The mill is closely barred, but Hayes gains an entry by swarming up the arm as it moves round until he reaches the top, where he enters by a small window. Inside he discovers "Slim Jack," but an attempt to capture her is frustrated by her henchmen, and Hayes finds himself bound and gagged watching the fuse to a barrel of gunpowder slowly burning away. At this moment "Dr. Preston" reappears and seeing as he imagines his "nephew" in this dangerous situation, unbinds him. The detective instantly springs to his feet and fells the "doctor," escaping as he came by means of the mill arm. Scarcely is he on the ground when a terrific explosion occurs and the mill is blown to atoms. "Dr. Preston" loses his life in the catastrophe and as the assembled hands of a neighboring ranch—who have been attracted by the noise of the explosion—stand bareheaded round his body, "Slim Jack" appears above the ruins hurling threats and taunts at Hayes.

Goaded by his defeat, the detective seeks the aid of the cowboys to hunt down the girl. She makes a valiant effort to escape by forcing her horse to spring from a suspension bridge into the river, but the boys of the West are too smart for her, and she is captured. Thus Hayes adds another victory to his credit, and the Spider League and the Black Thirteen are relegated to the record of the country's Criminal Investigation Department.

HARA-KIRI (Three parts).—Andre and Ivan two young officers and friends, have been appointed to the embassy at Tokio. In a teahouse they met Mimosa, a young dancer, whom Andre protects from the importunities of a hateful old Japanese Cabul. Ivan uses this opportunity to approach her. She repulses him; for her heart belongs to her chivalrous protector, and when after a certain time Andre is ordered back home, he leaves in Mimosa a woman who loves and yearns for him.

But at home the young officer soon forms new ties. Baroness Barowzow is charmed with him, and he confesses his love for her. Ivan, who hopes to win the baroness for the sake of her great wealth, jealously tries to cut out his more fortunate friend. Heated by wine, he seizes the baroness in brutal passion in his arms, and when Andre appears, he tries to ruin the latter's chances with the baroness by revealing Andre's Japanese love affair. Andre leaps at his throat. A fight ensues. By an unlucky blow Andre kills his only friend. With the aid of the baroness, he makes his escape. He reaches the border in wild flight and after many adventures he arrives in Japan, where Mimosa is waiting in the unshakeable hope of his return. She receives him lovingly. He would have been safely hidden had not Cabul, the old rake, who was still hovering about Mimosa, overheard him telling his beloved of his unfortunate deed. Cabul sees an opportunity to be avenged on the hated European who has taken his beloved Mimosa from him. He proposes to have Andre arrested unless Mimosa accedes to his desires. To save the man she loves, the poor girl agrees to his terms, without suspecting that Andre has received aid from another quarter. Through her brilliant connections the baroness is able to have Andre pardoned. She hastens in person to Tokio to bring him joyful news. Cabul's intrigue is frustrated. But it is too late to save Mimosa. As Andree returns to her house to bring her the news of his pardon, he finds her dying behind the screen. In her boundless love she has sacrificed herself for him. To avoid having to keep the promise which Cabul had wrung from her, she met a voluntary death—hara-kiri.

WORLD'S LEADER FEATURES

REBECCA, THE JEWESS (Six parts).—In Rotherwood Hall, the home of Cedric, the Saxon, preparations are being made for the evening meal. Rowena, who does not reciprocate Athelstane's affection, recalls her parting from Ivanhoe, the disinherited son of Cedric, on his departure for the Holy Wars in Palestine. Out of doors a poor Palmer makes his way to the Hall to escape the impending storm. Gurth, the swineherd, and Wamba, the jester, also hurry forward with the herd to gain shelter in time. Taking advantage of King Richard's absence, Prince John is plotting to seize the throne, aided by some of the nobles and by the Knights Templar. Sir Brian de Bois Guilbert and Sir Reginald Front de Boeuf, Knights Templar, are traveling to Ashby-de-la-Zouche to be present, with Prince, at the tournament. They also seek shelter at Rotherwood. The banquet prepared in their honor is marred by Cedric's refusal to bow the knee to any man. The boastful Normans claim all the honors for the Crusades. The Palmer upholds the bravery of the Saxons and challenges Sir Brian to meet Ivanhoe in combat when the latter shall return to England. The challenge is accepted.

Isaac of York and his daughter, Rebecca, now claim shelter from the storm. None will make room for the despised Jew but the poor Palmer, who willingly gives up his seat. Sir Brian and Sir Reginald take great interest in the beautiful Rebecca and the former instructs the Saracen servants to abduct her and seize the father. The plot is discovered and they are assisted to escape by the Palmer, but before Gurth will open the gates for them the Palmer has to reveal his identity. He is Wilfred of Ivanhoe himself. The Jew and his daughter, freed from their persecutors, at their home at Ashby, Ivanhoe borrows from Isaac the horse and armour necessary for the forthcoming combat. Rebecca is greatly struck with Ivanhoe's manly bearing. At the tournament Ivanhoe is declared victor and is handed the chaplet, but is badly wounded. With the money won in the fighting he sends Gurth to repay Isaac. King Richard, returned from captivity and wishing to learn the true state of the country under his brother's rule, wanders about the country as a lonely knight. Happening on the cell of a hermit, he craves rest and refreshment. On close acquaintance, the friar becomes most un-hermit-like and boisterous, and at this point the outlaw Locksley enters. A spy informs Brian at Richard's return, and the news is conveyed to Prince John. Sir Brian and Sir Reginald capture the Saxon household, it being part of their plan to abduct Rowena as well as Rebecca, the Jewess, and to hold the Jew until ransomed. Gurth and Wamba escape and carry the news to Richard Coeur-de-Lion and the outlaws.

At Torquilstone, the Castle of Front de Boeuf, the Jew is threatened with torture unless he gives the necessary order for his ransom. He bravely makes the condition that his daughter shall be given to him unharmed. Even as he is threatened with torture of a most revolting description, the outlaw band commences the attempt at rescue. Within the castle, Ulrica, aged and degraded daughter of the former Saxon lord, Torquil, distresses Rebecca by foretelling her fate at the hands of Sir Brian. He enters the room where Rebecca is confined, but she threatens to throw herself from the embrasure. The outlaw band and the King, with the help of villagers, successfully attack the castle, which is fired at last by Ulrica; she taunts the dying master, Reginald Front de Boeuf, while the flames creep around his death-bed. Sir Brian, however, fights his way through the attacking party, bearing with him the unhappy Rebecca.

Sir Brian hides his prisoner, in defiance of the rules of the order of Templars, in the preceptory. The Grand Master discovers the fact and puts down the knight's infatuation to witchcraft. For this serious crime she is tried, and condemned to death at the stake, but by the rules of the order, if she can find a champion to fight for her, and he overcomes the champion of the Knights Templar, she may go free. When informed of this, Ivanhoe, though not perfectly recovered from his wounds, sets off and arrives just as the herald makes his appeal for a champion for the last time. By vanquishing Sir Brian de Bois Guilbert he frees the Jewish maiden, who leaves England with her father, after bidding Ivanhoe a sad farewell, knowing that his love for Rowena is deep and lasting, and his brave fight to save her from the flames was only dictated by his noble sense of duty as a chivalrous knight.

WARNER'S FEATURES.

FOR IRELAND'S SAKE.—Marty has a forge in the hills, where he makes weapons for the "boys." A detachment of redcoats drive him from his lair, but he escapes capture for the time being by hiding under Eileen's cape. After numerous narrow escapes, he swims the lake and hides in an old cave where Eileen visits him daily with food. At last he and Eileen are captured, tried and imprisoned. Urged by Eileen's frantic mother, the village priest smuggles a file into Marty, and that night after cutting away his bars, Marty stuns the sentinel and by climbing the ivy covered wall to Eileen's window, rescues her also. They are married by the old priest and the next morning are on their way to America.

THE FIRST LAW OF NATURE.—Nellie Benton goes West by stage coach to join her father and Jack, her sweetheart, in their new home upon the plains. The stage coach is held up by a band of outlaw Indians under the leadership of Jim, one of Nellie's old admirers. Face to face with Nellie again, he compels her and her baby sister to remain in his cabin while he seeks a minister. They escape and travel with a band of friendly Indians. Meantime the sheriff's posse kills Little Rock, son of a powerful chief, for having in his possession the empty express box stolen from the stage coach. The Indians attack the settlers, and but for the timely arrival of a troop of cavalry out scouting would have massacred them all. Nellie, who had left the stockade to ring the bell on the hill for help, is saved from death by Jim, who gives his life to shield her, thereby making amends for his cowardly life.

THE ROSE OF YESTERYEAR.— The story opens with Miss Leonard, now a woman past the prime of life, relating the sad, romantic story of her life to her dearest niece, who is engaged to be married. As in a vision, the story shifts back forty years and discloses the interior of an orphan asylum. Three babies are there—two boy babies and one baby girl—awaiting adoption into a good home. Years pass and the orphaned children have grown up in three different homes. Miss Leonard's dearest treasures are a pair of tiny baby shoes and a faded plaid shawl given to her foster parents by the asylum nurse. Of her twin brother she knows nothing, except that he too has a tiny pair of shoes like those in her keeping. She loves and is loved in return by a dashing chap, whose mother had adopted him when a baby. They decide to elope, but are stopped by the groom's mother, who thinks she has discovered that Miss Leonard and her son are brother and sister—at least the baby shoes tend to prove it. In a quiet village Miss Leonard discovers her real brother, a clergyman, whose foster parents had lost his tiny shoes at the time of his adoption. She returns to the city and witnesses the marriage of her beloved to another woman. So ended her romance while all the years she treasured the tiny baby shoes that had brought her face to face with a great tragedy.

THE LOYALTY OF A SAVAGE.—Red Eagle is thrown by his horse and injured. Settlers westward bound pick him up and nurse him back to health. Red Eagle leaves for his own habitation, promising that he will some day reciprocate their kindness. A year later finds them in their permanent homes. Baby Early is left with her grandmother, while the other members of the family are at the round-up. Early seeing an Indian steal two of their horses, gives the alarm. In a thrilling chase the Indian is captured, but after a good beating is let go. Bad Indian, seeking revenge, kidnaps Early. Red Eagle, a member of the same tribe, recognizes Early and decides to restore her to the settlers who had saved his life. Bad Indian sets upon him and in the struggle is killed by Red Eagle, who escapes with Early. Ten years pass. Early has grown up as the adopted daughter of Red Eagle. Roy, an artist from the East, meets Early and falls madly in love with her. Red Eagle tells him the life story of Early and how he came to adopt her. On his way back East, Roy stops off at a wealthy rancher's home. The sight of the rancher's old frame wagon inspires Roy to relate Red Eagle's interesting story. Curious to see the girl, the rancher and the artist set out for Red Eagle's cabin, where in a heart-touching scene the father and long lost daughter are reunited. Roy readily obtains consent to marry Early, and so the story ends happily.
